its aid roads can be constructed on any sort of ground at the rate of eight miles a day.

A bitumin emulsion forms a hard skin over the surface of the ground that will make a roadway strong enough to bear an almost unlimited number of motor trucks. And it can be laid rapidly.

In laying the ordinary road for hard usage, it is necessary to provide a foundation of large stones upon which is placed a surface of light metal. By the new method the process is made infinitely more simple.

First of all the surface is scarified. A track is levelled off by means of a grader, and the bitumen emulsion is then mixed cold with the earth on the surface, forming the "skin." Requirements of lober transport and restores forming the "skin." Requirements of labor, transport and water are minimized by this new method hich assures the maintenance of communications between any punitive force and its base, and does away with the necessity for railways and other costly and difficult means of transportation.
