EDITORIAL NOTES

"Our grandchildren will laugh over the fact that not so very long ago there was a time when each nation sought to undersell the others, while their chief cities had already been brought within hailing distance by airplanes, telephone and the radio."

"Possessions which were once an intensification of the sense of power now awake an uneasy conscience even in the best people. A planless, cynical mood broods over this zero hour in which we are living. The reason for it is lack of imagination."

"The general confusion in the world arises neither from revolutions, nor from the losing of the war, nor yet from the winning of it. It is not the consequence of an invisible conspiracy of the rich against the poor, nor is it the result of the visible uprising of the poor against the rich. The contest lacks any such great motives. What we are experiencing is the failure of the professional. The world has too long relied on its own security, leaving its guidance to the specialist, the professional expert."

"It seems to me that a man who for twenty years has been building machinery with earnestness and originality, or has been studying cell structures with a microscope, or managing a railroad, or even studying history—all with great personal success—is far better fitted for the direction of a state than one who, for the same twenty years, has only been rushing around in the lobbies of legislative chambers, and, in reality, studying nothing but the biology of political parties."

"One should never reproach a leader for personal ambition. It is one of the most powerful of his incentives. It does not reflect in the slightest on the sincerity of his purpose. Through ambition and the zest of the game, noble human things have come to pass. But through patriotism alone no field marshal has ever yet won a victory, nor through philanthropy alone has a scientist ever discovered the means of extirpating a plague. Whoever hopes for healing from evangelical figures confuses power with soul."

"The need of the day is a practical idealism, even though it may have obscure sources. To each leader who moves in a direction wholly strange to us, we should prefer confidence in his integrity until convinced of the contrary."

"The World War is perhaps the first great war in history that brought to the front neither a statesman nor a military leader of the first rank. And it is symbolic that for lack of a leader we have immortalized above all the victim, the man who was led—the unknown soldier."

The Town Quack

that the change was being made as an economy measure. Well, he didn't tell the half of it. The inside dope is that the NEA comics and other features, are about the best that can be bought and they cost far too much for a little paper in a town the size of Midland. The Reporter-Telegram has kept up the purchase of these features about three years longer than they could be afforded and has strained every point to continue them indefinitely, but if you have ever tried to keep on spending money for something you can't afford, you know that sooner or later there comes a show-down. You have to pay off and pay up or get off and shut up. I don't want to go too much into detail, but the readers will just have to be patient for a little while until certain miracles can be accomplished, then watch for Boots, Wash Tubbs and all of your old favorites. They will be back in The Reporter-Telegram. Everybody on the force appreciates the interest shown by the public. They appreciate the "kicks" that have come in from the disappointed readers—all except the anonymous letter from some low-life who didn't have the nerve to come to the office and make his complaint in the ugly way he wanted to say it.

Anyway, folks, there are better days coming. We are taking our five-day week cheerfully, just to keep on putting out a daily paper for you and we hope you will be cheerful and patient with us about the change of some features. Laying all argument and prejudice aside, don't you think old Alley-Oop is a cute little playmate?

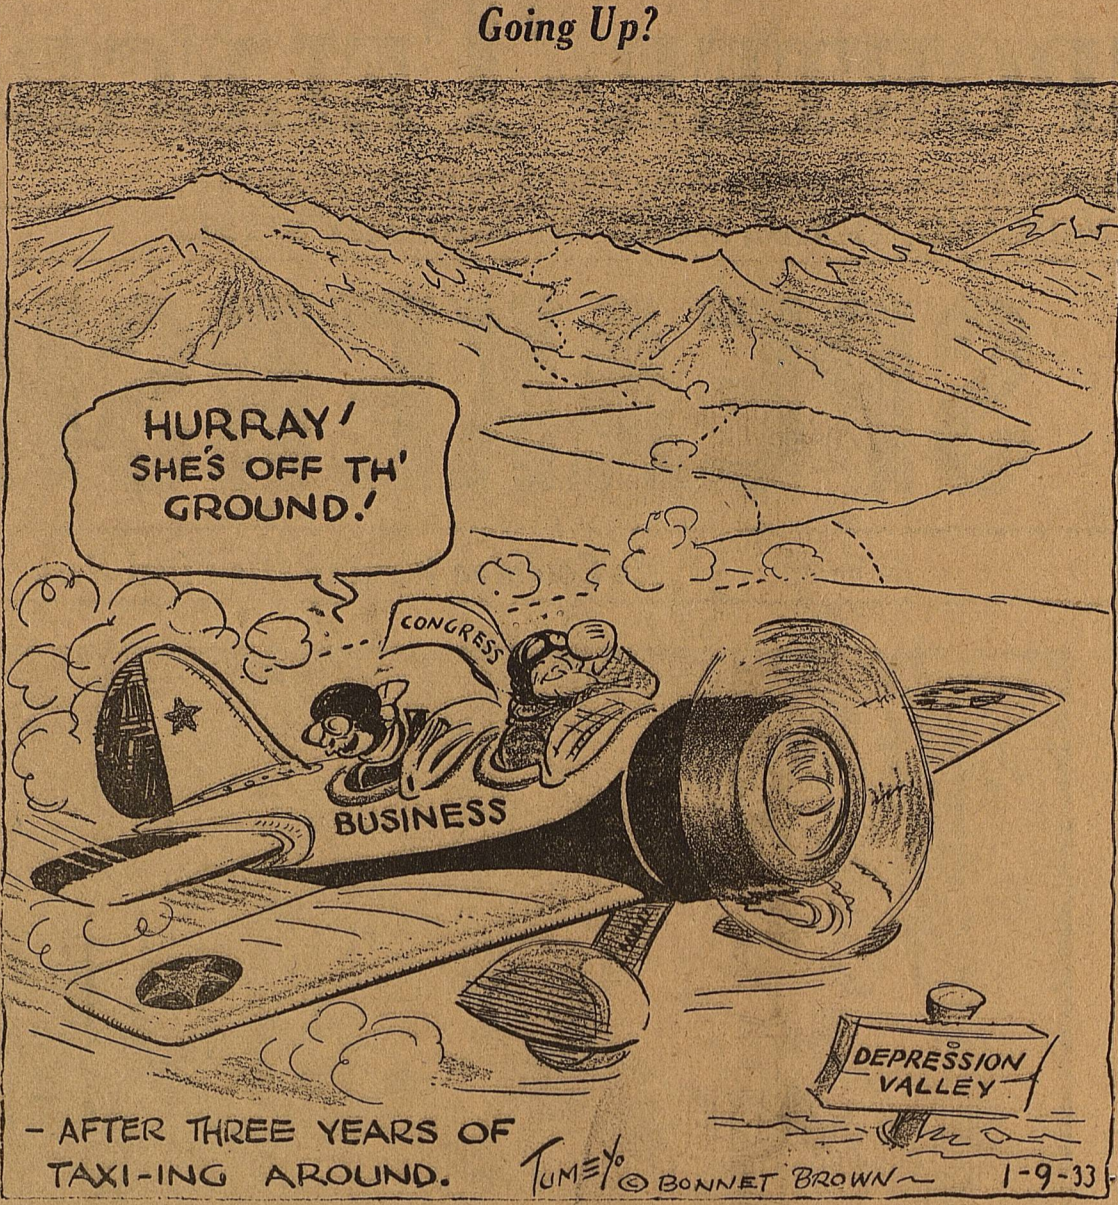

I suppose I ought to add something to what has already been said about the change in comes in this newspaper. The boss printed his message in the New Year edition, explaining briefly and to the point

Question: I have been told not to worry about catching cancer, but I can't help it. I hear of so many people having it now days that it looks to me as if some of them might be carriers of it, like in typhoid fever. Please tell me if this is true or not.
Answer: There is no reason for such fear. Cancer is a condition peculiar to the person who has it as result of a disturbance of the balance between destruction and increase of the cells of his body. While the appearance of cancer on the surface of the body and in the last stages is often unpleasant and disagreeable, and while it may be difficult to prevent an unpleasant odor, there need be no fear that the disease will spread to others, even to those who have the intimate care of the patient.

WE HAVE been telling the public for a good many years that Chesterfields taste better. They satisfy!

That wouldn't mean a thing if smokers found out that it wasn't so. Nobody can fool the people very long.

But a great many smokers have smoked Chesterfields for a long time, and they know that they taste right. And so they say to their friends, "If you want a cigarette that really tastes better, try Chesterfields!"

Chesterfields taste better because they are made of mild tobaccos that have been aged for two years. And there is just enough Turkish in them... but not too much.

We are sure that you, too, will enjoy their Mildness and Better Taste.

WHAT HAS HAPPENED
 In the original will of John Duncan, a hopeless invalid, Dr. David Graham, his protegee, and Robert Waldo, his cousin and lawyer, are left half each of his huge fortune. Waldo persuades the old man to change the will so that all the money will be left to David, saying that the young doctor needs it more than he does. Duncan acquiesces, and the lawyer retypes the will himself. Jane Chase, Duncan's nurse, is the recipient of the heart's of both David and Waldo though David is the favored one. On Christmas night, after Duncan had died, Jane announces that she would not have to bear the horror of waiting for death, and David refuses. Jane announces that she and David would be married the following day. Waldo, assuring them that he would return in time for the wedding, starts for New York, but doubles back on his tracks and comes back and murders Duncan. But he is seen by Morgan, a tramp. David is indicted for murder.

The voice of the Court Clerk droned out. "Gentlemen of the jury, have you agreed upon a verdict?"
 "We have," the foreman replied.
 "Do you find the defendant guilty or not guilty?"
 "We find the defendant guilty."
 Waldo's eyelids came down to veil the look of triumph in his eyes.
 "The foreman continued,—"of murder in the second degree."
 Waldo's eyes opened wide with a stare of frustrated rage.
 David was sentenced to prison, and Waldo having memories for his home which were unpleasant, decided to close it for a while. Everything was in readiness to leave when the doorbell rang. Malcolm answered it, and there in the vestibule stood Morgan.
 "Hello, Mal," he exclaimed warmly. "Do you remember Santa Claus?"
 "What is it?" the butler asked. "I want to see Waldo."
 "He's busy."

"So am I—but I came all the way from New York to see him."
 Malcolm was disdainful. "About what?"
 "About last Christmas."
 This was a tender subject to Malcolm, and he started to shut the door right in Morgan's face, but Morgan put his foot in the opening of the door and stopped him. His voice rose angrily. "Now, wait a minute! You got in there and tell him what I told you."
 "What is it, Malcolm?" Waldo called from the study.
 The butler went to inform his master and returned to admit Morgan. Waldo was seated at his desk when the man entered. "What can I do for you?"
 Morgan helped himself to a cigar from the humidor on the desk, and without being invited to, sat down.
 "Thanks."
 The lawyer was impatient. "What is it? What do you want?"
 "There's something I left here last Christmas. I came to get it."
 "What was it?"
 "A suit of clothes," Morgan grinned. "The one I got on is in pretty bad shape."
 "I'm afraid you'll have to be a bit more explicit."
 "Sure. Could you spare a light?"
 "Certainly," Waldo held a desk lighter for him. Both heads were close together and the men were eyeing each other warily.
 "I saw you kill him, brother—and I heard you tell him why and wherefore."
 "What do you expect me to do about it?"
 Morgan became impudent as he leaned back and puffed on his cigar. "Well, you're a lawyer. You might give me some legal advice."
 "Certainly. I'd advise you not to repeat your ridiculous story to anybody else."
 "Why not?"
 "Because it makes you an accessory to murder. Before and after the fact," Waldo rose with a menacing attitude, looking down upon Morgan.

The man was startled. "How do you figure that out?"
 "If what you say is true, you ought to have brought your knowledge to the attention of the district attorney before, or during the trial of Dr. Graham. Why didn't you?" Waldo said harshly.
 "Because the trial didn't come out the way I figured—or you either." He rose and looked toward the lawyer. "You framed Graham, and then took his case to make sure. You threw the case. You expected the jury to get him out of the way for you with a verdict of first degree murder. But you can't figure out a jury—nobody can. They're always pulling boners." He puffed on his cigar. "And you'll be pulling a boner if you don't listen to reason."
 Waldo was surprisingly mild. "Perhaps you're right. What's your idea of reason?"
 "Well, I could live like a prince on a thousand a month."
 Waldo looked at him for a minute in silence, then reached into his wallet, which he proceeded to open. "What's the name of your name was?" he asked pleasantly, without looking up.
 "Morgan." His eyes lit up as Waldo opened his wallet and began to count out some money. "Wilfred P. Morgan."
 After Morgan had departed, Waldo thought of a plan to rid himself of the blackmailier. It was part of his clever planning. The lawyer immediately called Jane.
 "I've come with a marvelous message," he declared. "The papers will be full of it in the morning, but I wanted you to know first."
 "I've come with a marvelous message," he declared. "The papers will be full of it in the morning, but I wanted you to know first."
 "What is it?"
 "I promised you that I'd get David out of prison, and I've kept my promise."
 "He'll be free within a month."
 "You've heard from the governor?"
 "No. It won't be a pardon but a complete vindication. I'm able to prove his innocence. I've discovered a new witness in the case—Duncan—a dead man. I was searching among his papers this afternoon and I came upon a note he had written—a suicide note. It will clear David beyond the shadow of a doubt. I've been assured by the district attorney, to whom I've already turned the note over."
 Graham was freed and he and Jane went married. Nothing more was heard from Waldo or Morgan for a month and then Waldo started out to collect some more easy cash.
 Through the heavy traffic, Morgan was weaving his way across the street. Down the thoroughfare, Waldo's car was coming at a good rate of speed directly at him. It ran into Morgan. There was a screeching of brakes as the car slowed down and screams and shouts from the people who had witnessed the apparent accident. There was the sound of a police whistle and soon two policemen were running toward the scene of the catastrophe.
 Waldo brought his car to a stop, got out quickly and went back to the spot where Morgan's body was slumped out with a crowd collecting around it.
 "If there is anything I can do, officer," said Waldo, handing his card to the policeman. The latter looked at the card and then down at Morgan, who was stretched out on the pavement.
 "I guess there is nothing anybody can do, Mr. Waldo," the other officer said.
 "The poor fellow's had his last drink," the other officer declared. A queer smile came into the lawyer's face as he turned away from the scene. Everything was working out just as he had planned it. Now to get David out of the way and everything would be clear for him to marry Jane. This was his next task and Waldo had a plan to accomplish it that would excel anything he had undertaken. He hurried to his home and phoned the young physician.
 "This is Waldo, David—I'm at home. I wasn't feeling well this morning, so I thought I'd better not go into town. It's gotten worse." He paused. "I was wondering if you couldn't run out and look me over. . . . Yes, I know. . . . I'm really feeling very badly and I do wish you'd come. . . . If you leave now you can easily get back by four. . . . Thank you, David." He smiled as he replaced the receiver on the hook.
 Morgan, who had kept track of Jane, sent for her as soon as he was conscious. He looked up at her and spoke with difficulty. "You don't remember me, do you? I was up to that house last Christmas. I was supposed to be Santa Claus. It wasn't an accident. The man in that car ran into me on purpose—I should have known a guy like Waldo would out-think me."
 Jane was startled at the mention of the name "Waldo?" she asked. He repeated the name grimly.

"Waldo—the man who killed Duncan—"
 She stared at him, horrified. "Will you repeat what you have just told me before witnesses?" She arose to her feet.
 "In almost a whisper Morgan repeated. "Sure—I will—but you'd better hurry."
 She ran out of the room and returned almost immediately with a nurse and an intern. Slowly, painfully, and sometimes almost inaudibly, Morgan told the story of how he had watched Waldo kill Duncan the day after Christmas, of how the lawyer had tortured the invalid, and taunting him with the fact that Graham would be executed for the murder. Then, having completed his confession, Morgan gasped and sank into that deep sleep from which there is no awakening. (To Be Continued.)

 "We used to have a lot of petty thieving going on around here," Uzzell explained, "but somehow or other, since I got my dogs, it has plumb quit."
 Tom and Jerry and Lottie arrived about three months ago and
