JAPANESE FEAR OF AMERICA

One of the oldest of all axioms is that there are two sides to every question. Somehow, too, it is the first thing that gets forgotten when relations between two great powers become strained.

Mr. Matsuoka remarked bluntly that his people are quite as disturbed by the "American menace" as we ourselves are by the "yellow peril."

"We have always known that we had no capacity to wage war successfully against the richest and the most secure nation in the world. We therefore—as we as a whole—have been given to believe that your arguments about your 'necessities for defense' against a Japanese danger had design behind them.

"At times, and not far distant times, you spoke in terms, and displayed naval force in the Pacific, that caused our people no little anxiety. It will take more than a statement that you are concerned mainly with maintaining anti-war machinery to allay our popular anxiety."

"We have always looked on ourselves as a peace-loving nation faced, in the Pacific, by a designing, hard-boiled and militaristic power—Japan—from whom almost anything might be expected. And now it develops that the Japanese feel that the exact reverse of all of this is true. We fear what they may do, they fear what we may do—and misunderstanding and suspicion increase year by year.

There are two sides to every question. It is a good thing that we are able, at this stage of the game, to get a look at Japan's side.

SHOULD WOMEN BE HANGED?

Arizona's state board of pardons and paroles has refused to recommend clemency for Winnie Ruth Judd, convicted murderer, and unless new court action proves more effective than anything her lawyers have tried here before the young woman must be hanged on April 21.

And this brings up again the old question: is it proper public policy to send women to the gallows?

Under our modern ideas of sex equality, there is little that can logically be said against it. Equal rights bring equal responsibilities; if women are to enjoy the same status as men they must face the same penalties for their transgressions. The time when the mere fact of a woman's sex could win a mitigation of her punishment seems to be past.

Yet the spectacle of a woman going to the gallows is not a pretty one. Is it simply a holdover of out-moded sentimentalism that makes some of us feel that it is wrong?

The Town Quack

(Reserves the right to "quack" about everything without taking a stand on anything.) "Reserves the right to 'quack' about everything without taking a stand on anything."

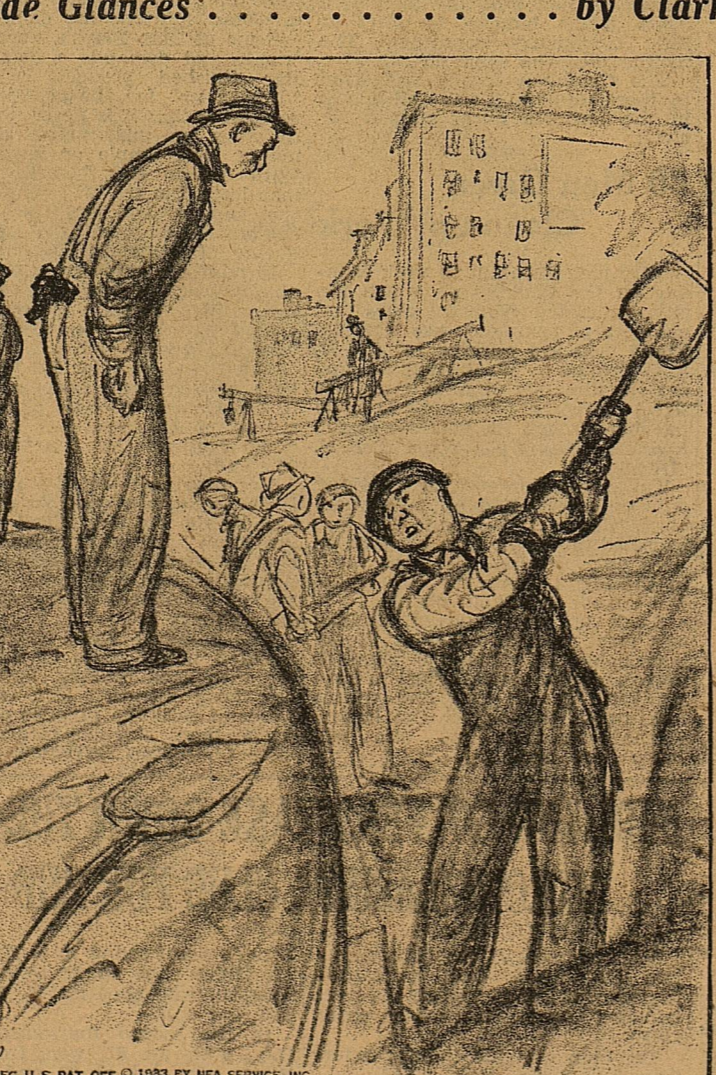

"Is your poor husband dead?" ventured the minister, seeing an aged woman of the parish had put on mourning.

"Oh, no, suh, he ain't dead." "Why are you in black?" "Well, suh, the old man nagged and bothered me so much that I've went mournin' again for mah' first husband."

"Bredem, we must do something to remedy de Status Quo," said a colored preacher to his congregation.

LETTERS to the EDITOR

Dear Sir: In your issue of February 23rd there was an article captioned, "Dictatorship Proposed by Lewis" which reflects unfavorably upon the radio programs formerly broadcast by Halsey, Stuart & Co.

Regarding your reference to this house advising a woman to sell her government bonds and buy Insular securities, the facts are as follows: At the hearings before the senate banking committee in Washington a letter was introduced by the committee's counsel referring to a transaction whereby a woman customer of Halsey, Stuart & Co. had exchanged $5,000 in liberty bonds for $5,500 (par value) of other bonds including $1,000 of corporation securities company notes. The sketchy way in which this matter was dealt with led to the impression being widely spread that Halsey, Stuart & Co. had deliberately traded this woman out of her government bonds into other allegedly worthless securities. The facts are that the whole transaction began with the suggestion of a brother of the woman who himself was later in the employ of Halsey, Stuart & Co. The woman suggested to a member of the Halsey, Stuart & Co. sales department that a list of bonds be prepared for her sister which would yield a larger income than she was obtaining from her government bonds. In the list of bonds for exchange which were submitted to her, there were five issues, one of them being $1,000 Corporation Securities company note which she since 4-10-33 has sold on March 2, 1931, when the transaction was made, Corporation Securities company notes were selling in the open market for $97.13 and were considered by ourselves and others to be a thoroughly sound investment. The other five bonds which were involved in this transaction have continued to pay interest when due.

The significant thing about this incident is that the reference to it did not originate with the customer; in fact, she was totally unaware that the matter had been referred to before the senate committee until she read about it in the newspapers. As best evidence of her disposition it may be pointed out that she has remained a customer of Halsey, Stuart & Co. and, recently, made additional investments through us.

Referring to the use of a college professor for presenting the "Old Counsellor" talks, it is important at the outset to understand that the texts of the "Old Counsellor" talks were prepared by Halsey, Stuart & Co. and that the "Old Counsellor" was merely the spokesman and was never represented otherwise. Those who understand the technique of radio broadcasting, as it applies to a program of a talking program than most other programs which employ a great amount of entertainment talent, music, etc. in order to sustain interest in the program it was obviously advisable to have the talks delivered by someone with a trained, pleasing voice adaptable to radio broadcasting. Halsey, Stuart & Co. searched its own organization for a suitable voice but could find no one able to give clear, consistent quality of performance in reading the text—for the simple reason that such work requires long training in voice culture and delivery. The whole method by which the "Old Counsellor" talks were presented over the air was thoroughly in accordance with the common practice in the preparation and presentation of radio programs. It just happened that the man chosen for this work, out of many others who were considered and tried out in actual auditions, was a college professor. His particular field of work was public speaking and he had had experience in presenting educational subjects over the air. He was a logical choice, from material at hand, for this work. The fact that he was a college professor has no significance and should not be used to intimate that his profession was used as a means of unduly influencing listeners. The "Old Counsellor" was frequently referred to in the Halsey, Stuart & Co. programs merely as the spokesman of the house.

We are giving you these facts because we assume that you wish to know them and that there was no intent on your part to be unfair, in publishing the article referred to. It is regrettable that such erroneous statements are published without apparently little effort made to check up beforehand as to the facts—thus doing damage that is difficult to repair.

Yours truly, Halsey, Stuart & Co. Chicago, Ill.

in green pastures. He leadeth me beside the still waters. He restoreth my soul. He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for His name's sake. Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death,

First Koli, then Karpov removed their caps. At the last words the Tsaritsa had moved a little closer and looked a little more protectively at the Tsar.

"We are ready," the Tsar said finally, closing the Bible.

"Is that all you're taking?" Koli said, self-consciously, looking at the desk.

"Yes," said the Tsaritsa, giving him a warning look. She began to pick up her things.

"Please come on," Koli said impatiently.

Turning to the children, the Tsaritsa said:

"Come on, my brood. Are you dressed warmly?"

"Yes, mamuschka," Aloysa answered.

The Tsaritsa looked around for the Tsar, who had remained at the desk, adding a dossier to his effects.

"Nicky..." she said, stopping.

"Yes, darling... I forgot this," he said, a little excited.

He handed the dossier to Koli.

"What's this?" Koli asked suspiciously.

"All the reforms ever proposed in Russia in the last ten years—some of them are bad—some excellent. Even your revolutionary ideas are there."

"I was thinking that if you could get this to some of the people in the government—the sincere people—there must be many of them—well, it might save them tragic mistakes. All the needs of Russia are so clear, I outlined there—they might find a bridge between revolution and the kind of government they're after."

"I guess we can get on without any suggestions from you," Koli said, tossing the dossier to the couch.

"You will, yes. I was thinking of Russia. Well, Alix?"

She stood looking back into the room.

"Come on, come on," Koli said, now in the corridor.

"A last look?" the Tsaritsa said graciously to Koli.

"This room is such an old friend."

She looked for an instant, as they walked impatiently, in the corridor. The room was cleared of all save her. She stood on the threshold and spoke to the room.

"Good-bye."

They walked down the long corridor, past the line of Mongol soldiers.

In the courtyard another group of men were drawn up in rude formation, a mixed command of soldiers and sailors. When the imperial family came out into the courtyard, they were amazed to see no conveyance was there to take them to the station.

The Tsar turned to Koli to inquire about this, but the renegade officer cut him short.

"What do I want with them?" the officer cut him short.

"Put down those bundles," he ordered. This was done.

Hardly had they straightened up than a brisk order rang through the courtyard:

"Aim!"

The rifles and revolvers of the motley group of soldiers were aimed at the imperial party. A little cry of terror escaped the children. The Empress gathered them about her, while the Tsar, drawing himself to attention, made the sign of the cross.

"Fire!"

A leaden hail of bullets beat about them. They fell.

Koli gave the order to cease firing and stepped forward to examine the effects of his work. They were all dead. As he straightened up from his examination of the bodies, he shook his head. For a moment it had seemed to him that he had heard faraway music, and that he had recognized the tune as the imperial anthem.

"God save our Little Father, the White Tsar."

He shook his head. A good Communist, a good party man, could not afford to harbor such notions.

In a dug-out in the trenches back of Ypres, Lieutenant Paul Chego-chief of the British army, was hunched over in the darkness, his eyes on the radium painted dial of his wrist watch. A whistle was in his mouth. As the minute hand came up to the appointed minute, he blew a long blast on his whistle, scuttled out of the low doorway and flung himself over the parapet of the trench. To right and left of him in the darkness, he could hear the Cockney soldiers of his platoon, shouting and cursing as they scaled the parapet and began wading through the barbed wire, their rifles at high port.

A spurt of machine gun fire beat against the darkness. Two bullets found their way to Paul. He fell. Losing consciousness as a burly Yorkshire man picked him up and threw him over his shoulder, he cried out:

"For the White Tsar! For Holy Russia! Forward!"

"Balmy!" the Yorkshire man commented. "All balmy!"

Long, long days followed at the base hospital. Then another hospital, convalescence, and the painful task of learning to walk on a wooden leg. But these days were lightened by long letters from Natasha.

Finally the day came when he went back to Natasha in a little apartment in Soho square.

"My darling—poor darling," she murmured as she took him in her arms.

"The imperial family is dead," Paul said dully. "I could tell from the way Remezov spoke when I saw him that he was sure that he even knew the manner of their death. He did not want to tell me. He feared to hurt me. But he would not have hurt me. I have steeled my heart to hear it."

Natasha embraced him comfortingly.

"But Russia lives," he said. "Russia lives here in our hearts and will live with us so long as we live a useful and happy life."

"It was the last command of the Tsar to you, Paul. He told you to seek happiness," she said. Pressing his cheek to hers, Paul whispered: "I have obeyed the Tsar. I have found happiness. I have you."

TO AWARD FELLOWSHIP

AUSTIN.—The Texas Federation of Women's clubs scholarship, that is granted annually to a woman student of the University of Texas, will be awarded the latter part of May.

Applications for this scholarship must be filed with the federation committee on or before April 20. Those applying are required to fill out an application blank, secure an official statement of their university credits, obtain recommendations from their instructors, and file with Miss Annie Webb Blanton, associate professor of education at the university.

The rules require that an applicant shall have been a student in the University of Texas for at least one year and she shall pledge herself to teach for as long a period as she is the recipient of the scholarship.

The committee on award includes the following: Chairman, Mrs. J. W. Fincher, president of the Texas Federation, Houston; Mrs. L. B. Rande, 315 East Evergreen st., San Antonio; secretary of the committee, Miss Annie Webb Blanton, 1909 Cliff st., Austin.

alone have cost the state approximately $1,500,000 within the last five years, the report said. The committee made no estimate of the amount spent for dip or other preventives.

With this amount already invested in the work, however, the committee recommended the eradication program be carried out. The Livestock Commission and Chief Inspector have committed themselves to the statement that, with continuation of the program thru 1935, complete eradication can be accomplished, the report said.

The report suggested the work be reorganized into three districts and the work within the districts be carried out along natural boundaries rather than county lines. It also suggested that the number of inspectors be reduced and more responsibility placed in those retained.

Beautiful Hostess Loves Affairs Only With Men Other Women Should Possess

Satirical, smart and witty, 'Our Beautiful Hostess' is a clever adaptation of a drawing-room drama and a rousing Constance Bennett.

Neither Connie nor her gowns have ever been lovelier, and her histrionic talents disclose a new subtlety, revealing her an actress equal to any role.

Despite the fact that Miss Bennett is almost constantly on the screen, the picture is not exclusively hers. The cast is imposing in number and importance, and tremendously effective in an interesting assortment of characters.

Miss Bennett portrays Lady Pearl Grayston, who said good-bye to an American fortune when she turned it over to an English title. Lord Grayston, her husband, promptly squandered her money and lives so much on the Riviera with his mistress that his wife, if she wants him to attend any of her parties, has to specially invite him.

Beer Here but the Customs Anticipate Continual Battle

This is the first of six thrilling tales of Uncle Sam's war against the liquor smugglers; authoritative accounts of the unending conflict between the liquor gangs and their arch foes, customs agents and coast guardsmen.

By MORRIS GILBERT NEA Service Writer

WASHINGTON—Now that beer is flowing, what about the work of the old enforcement organizations? The answer is: Business as usual.

Beer is the least of their worries. As long as there's money in hard liquor, gangsters will try to run it. That's what the customs people and the coast guard say.

So they are keeping on with the long, tough battle around our coasts and borders, trying to stem the flow of contraband which helps to net between $2,000,000,000 and $3,000,000,000 a year in income to America's bootleggers.

It is a war of nerve, wits, and dogged persistence of force, trickery and double-crossing. Mostly it's grinding police work, specializing in preventive measures. But sometimes there is an affair like the Battle of the Water Lilies to brighten things up.

The Battle of the Water Lilies was fought recently in a Florida swamp and netted the customs service a shipment of contraband liquor, a nice amphibian airplane, and a hearty laugh.

That amphibian had been keeping officials attached to the West Palm Beach station awake nights, worrying. She was making regular trips from Nassau, flying independently over customs headquarters and disappearing before the law could follow.

By the time pursuit planes were in the air, each trip, the amphibian was—no doubt—already squatting in the hinterland, unpacking cargo.

It got so the customs people dreamed about that ship. They brooded and lost their appetite. The music of her Wright Whirlwind motor taunted them sarcastically. It was like a fly that won't be swatted.

But one day they managed to trail her. When she came past, a customs plane was idling, made a quick take-off, and gave chase.

The sun-runner came down in Lake Okechobee, at the northern end, taxied to a small island, and drew alongside a jetty half lost in marsh grass. A half dozen men were waiting on the island to unload her. So much the customs pilot

Wine Sales Are Worrying French

PARIS, April 7, (UP).—Although the advent of beer in the United States continues to have illiberal echoes here, wine men are wondering just to what extent they will be able to trade with the United States in view of the limitations put on the alcoholic content of American beverages.

Although chemists say it would not be difficult to devise a process for extraction of alcohol from wines, they point out that the liquids thus obtained would bear very little resemblance to the present beverages.

The lightest wines known here are seven per cent alcohol, but are not considered good, as they cannot keep. Too light wines, it is pointed out, easily start to "work" and sour, with the obvious result that they cannot travel.

Ordinary table wines in general use here contain at least nine per cent alcohol. In the vineyard regions, wine unfit for shipment, and consequently considered unfit for sale, is drunk when it contains as little as seven per cent alcohol.

The rat population of the world is estimated at 10,000,000,000 as compared to some 2,000,000,000 human beings.

BEEF, PORK AND MUTTON FROM THE SIMPSON & ELKIN FEED LOTS AND APPETIZING GROCERIES FROM THE M SYSTEM STORES

WILL BE USED BY MRS. STELLA FLOYD IN THE REPORTER-TELEGRAM ALL-ELECTRIC COOKING SCHOOL TUESDAY

"I was greatly impressed with the modern sanitary plants where you kill and dress the animals sold through the M System markets," said Mrs. Stella Floyd, conductor of The Reporter-Telegram All Electric Cooking School, when she visited our feed lots and plant.

"The splendid animals which you are feeding furnished an interesting sight. Surely Midland people are fortunate in being able to buy beef, pork and mutton which is fed and killed in this manner," she said.

Mrs. Floyd was liberal with her praise of the M System stores, the convenient shopping arrangement, the large stocks of recognized brands of merchandise.

Especially did she comment on the products of our markets, all home fed and home killed in the most approved sanitary methods.

Simpson & Elkin beef, pork and mutton is furnished fresh every day from our own feeding pens and killing plant.

HOUSTON MAN LIKELY CHECK ALL WASHED OUT

HOUSTON (UP).—Although five Houston men have applied, it is not certain President Roosevelt will appoint a Houstonian to succeed R. B. Morris as U. S. collector of customs for the Houston-Galveston district, which extends as far north as Dallas.

Morris, a Republican appointed by President Hoover, in 1930, is the first Houstonian ever to hold the office of customs collector in this district, his term expires June 2, 1934.

A stern fight is being waged to have a Galvestonian appointed to the post, reestablishing a precedent broken by Morris' appointment.

The five Houston democrats seeking appointment are M. Frank Hammond, former sheriff; John T. Scott, Jr., and Lewis Finner, attorneys; Henry B. Williamson, district manager of the California Fruit Growers' Exchange, and Brady W. Steele, drug store owner.

Galveston's candidates are Fred Pabst and Ed R. Cheeseborough. Pabst was collector under President Wilson and Cheeseborough was a former postmaster of Galveston. Appointment is for four years.

Aire (with 80 gallons of Mexican "sotol" or alcohol aboard) during a long chase and made an arrest in air over Potote, Atascosa county, Texas, the customs unit gained another one.

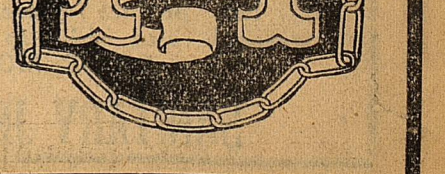

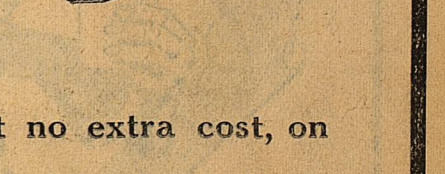

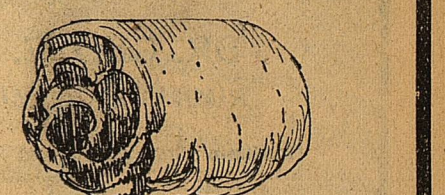

That was a matter of chase and capture. Up in Lockport, N. Y., a while ago the authorities added a monoplane to their fleet by a bright piece of deception. A monoplane was cruising over from Canada every day and apparently landing in Becker field, a 26-acre clearing in the midst of pine forest on the road to Buffalo.

It took only five minutes to dump the load, and the plane never came down while customs men were picketing. Obviously the pilot was working with some one on the ground who gave a signal that the coast was clear. The customs set about learning what the signal was.

One day, as usual, the ship came over from Canada and the pilot circled Becker field anxiously. A certain high-priced touring car stood in the center of the clearing. It looked familiar to the pilot. The men in the white sweaters were the same, all right, but the men inside them were customs inspectors.

One of the toughest things about it was, the pilot said afterwards, that he had just made his final down-payment of $100 on the airplane that day.
