THE PATRONAGE EVIL

President Roosevelt's action in putting all postmasters under civil service seems to be a long step in the right direction. And it leads to the hope that our major political parties will eventually have sense enough to drop the patronage game entirely.

That the federal service affairs because parties try to reward their hacks with public office is notorious. It is also beginning to be clear that passing out these jobs usually creates more enemies than friends. The number of jobs is strictly limited; the job-hunters are like the sands of the sea, uncountable. For one who is chosen there are a dozen to be rejected, and those who are rejected are very apt to get sore about it.

Deciding to fill government positions on a merit basis might turn out to be good politics as well as good government.

News values are said to depend upon unusualness. One of these days there's going to be a world conference with no reported breakdown. Will editors be awake to its news value?

Madam: "I'm well acquainted with those eccentric Arkansas mosquitoes. I spent several years on a farm in that state, and they caused me lots of trouble. Of course, since they eat nothing but horse meat, most people are perfectly safe around them, but I could name some who would be in great danger."

During the first year I lived there, these insects swarmed in on my place one afternoon and ate every horse I had, including two saw-horses, then raided my horse-radish patch.

These mosquitoes are hybrid insects, the result of crossing a New Jersey screw-bill mosquito with a turkey buzzard, and retain all the mean qualities of both. They operate mostly in daylight, but eat glow-worms and lightning bugs so they can work at night if necessary.

When they open their mouths it's just like a big headlight.

One night I saw a couple of them out in my back yard, flying around with their lights on. I got out my old gun and took a shot at them, but they didn't pay any attention to me—just moved out of the way of the bullets—and the noise brought more mosquitoes, all lit up.

I was disgusted and went to bed. Later in the night I heard a strange noise and looked out the window to see what it was. Those darned mosquitoes were all lined up, taking turns at sharpening their bills on my grindstone.

And there on the wheels sat some of the braver mosquitoes, picking their teeth with the spokes.

Truthfully yours, MRS. JOE CAPRIOTA.

Colonel True invites readers of his stories to write to him and tell about some of their own remarkable experiences. No holds barred. Each person writing will receive a free membership card of the Amalgamated Association of Yarn Spinners. Address Colonel True, in care of this newspaper.

Dear Colonel True: While I was visiting in Arkansas a few years ago, a crowd of us started on a fishing trip in a wagon. When we had gone but a short distance, I noticed a cloud gathering and urged that we turn back. My friends studied the cloud carefully, then informed me it was only a drove of mosquitoes. I begged them to go back then, but they said not to worry—those mosquitoes ate only horse flesh. When the mosquitoes had passed over, I was tremendously relieved to find none of us bitten, but when we started looking for the horses we found that only the bones remained.

I See by the Papers Powerful words those—"I see by the papers." It may refer to news or to advertising—but when it's in the paper it's on black and white—reliable, believable. When do people see by the papers about your store or service? Does it impress them? Do they remember and remark about it? They will see, read and act if the advertising is sound. Sound advertising is the result of experience. Advertising is the life of a business. THE REPORTER-TELEGRAM place, and were still there the next day, prowling around looking for more horses. Up in the morning I sneaked out and set a haystack on fire, hoping the smoke would drive them off. But it didn't work. They held a brief consultation, then gathered around a pond back of the barn, got it by the edges, flew over the haystack with it and dumped the water on the fire.

I got my gun again and started shooting. Finally killed one and shot the bill off another. He seemed stunned for a minute but soon recovered and walked over to the dead mosquito, broke off his bill and carried it into the blacksmith shop.

Through a window, I could see what he was doing. He tapped out his face, threaded the dead mosquito's bill and screwed it into place. He came out just as good as new, with a demountable bill, whatever advantage there might be in that.

My brother Ossie, who was living with me at the time, saw two or three unusually large mosquitoes among the bunch in the yard, and put some salt on their tails with a shotgun, so he could catch them.

He killed all but one of those he captured and kept that one for a pet. We named him Superbelow, for no specific reason, and in a little while we became quite fond of him. He was allowed to run around the place pretty much as he pleased, and it wasn't long until he began to develop a great appetite for rats. He'd fly around slowly, then suddenly dart down and impale a big rat on his bill. But they sometimes slipped off and got away.

When this happened, Superbelow would sit down and weep loudly. Ossie took pity on him, got him down, heated his bill red hot and forged a barb on the end of it, like a fish hook.

After that Superbelow could harpoon his rats and they stayed with him. But, some time later, when he learned to chew tobacco, Ossie had to bore a hole in his bill so he could spit.

When cold weather came along, Superbelow withered and died. We buried him, watering his grave with our tears. But he must have sprouted, because the next spring a mesquite bush came up there and made two bushels and a half of mosquitoes.

Dear Colonel True: I met your brother Ossie the other day, and he told me about an experience you and he had in Wyoming last summer. He said the two of you went out exploring one day, without your guns, and were making your way along a narrow ledge on the side of a cliff when you were suddenly confronted by a ten-foot grizzly bear. Turning to escape, you found a similar bear had been following you and was right behind. And there you were, he said, a bear on each side, with a sheer drop of two thousand feet on one hand, and a perpendicular wall of solid rock on the other. Trapped without a weapon of any kind.

Just as Ossie got to this point in the story, someone offered to set 'em up and, a couple of hours later when I was able to pry him loose from the bar, he had forgotten the rest of the story. I can't sleep more than 12 hours at night now, wondering if you two got out of that predicament alive. How in the world did you manage to escape?

H. A. PALMER.

Sir: It was quite simple. We went back to camp and got our guns. When we

Angelo Water Free From Contamination

SAN ANGELO.—The state health department found no contamination either in raw water from Lake Concho or from the city mains in recent examination, according to reports from Austin to Eugene Lowrie, city manager.

Samples of raw water were taken from above the Lone Wolf dam and from the river opposite Glenmore addition, also from the city mains, each showing itself clear and fit for drinking purposes without any dangers to health.

The city's use of water twice this month has hit 4,000,000 gallons a day, the first time on July 3 and the second on July 13, according to a check of records at the West Texas Utilities pumping plant adjacent to Lake Concho. Rising tides of heat and continued drying of moisture together with the effort to keep vegetation alive brought maximum use. Each month this year, water consumption has been heavier than last year, with the exception of April.

Peak use this year was on May 3 when 4,333,368 gallons went through the mains, on July 3 the total was 4,000,032 and on July 13 it was 4,041,699.
