Banditry Game of Youth in Lives of Famous Outlaws

FORT WORTH (U.P.)—Banditry,, like baseball and football, is a game of youth, if the lives of the Southwest's four most notorious outlaws are indications.

These four desperadoes, two mod outlaws are indications.

These four desperadoes, two moderns—Clyde Barrow and Charles (Pretty Boy) Floyd, and two of the stage coach day—Billy the Kid and Sam Bass, reached the pinnacles of their unlawful trade while still in their twenties.

As in legitimate sports, their careers appear to be comparatively short, due to the bullets of officers, not to their warning prowness.

Billy the Kid was only 21 when he was killed after terrorizing New Mexico with a murder for each of his years and a killer's record that has made his name a living part of the West's history, as much as that of Buffalo Bill Cody in his commendale pursuits as a trail blazer and pony-express rider.

Until the rise of Barrow, Sam Bass was the Jesse James of Texas bank robbers. Altholygh he was past 30 when he was killed in a gun batle with Texas rangers at Round Rock about the middle of the last century, he achieved the leadership of his calloused band of brigands while still in his twenties.

A trip to South Dakota with a heard of calle for northern railroad builders started Bass on his reckless career. A train robbery in Nebraska made him a fugitive from justice. His hiding place in North Texas became a refuge for the worst crminals, a rendezvous for Texas worst band of outlaws—under the leadership of youthful Bass.

Barrow and Floyd, claimants to the thrones of Bass and Billy the Kid, are both young, although the name of each has been on the lips of officers and citizens for several years.

WASHINGTON, April 10. (U.P.)-Dr. William A. Wirt today named Lawrence Todd of the Soviet Tass news agency as the person who referred to the president as the "Kerensky of the revolution."

Todd severed connections here with the Federated Press, an organized labor publication, before joining the Tass agency. He is an American citizen and a descendant of a soldier who fought in the American revolution.

The revelation came after Wirthad named six lesser "brain trusters." three of whom were women, as being present at a party last September where the revolution charges were brought out.

Wirt named Mary Taylor, economist of the Agricultural Adjustment administration, and Hildegarde Kneeland of the agriculture department as acquiescing to Todd's remark. Todd severed connections here

SOLDIERS' REVENGE!

Any man who served in the A. E. F. during the World War will be interested to learn of the charges which have been placed against an army medical officer in the Canal Zone, whose court martial is pending.

This officer, it is alleged, had a castor oil complex. A soldier who came in with an injured foot got a big dose of castor oil and was sent back to duty; so did another who came down with appendicitis.

As a result, charges of malpractice have been filed and the officer must appear in an army court.

The doughboys had a saying, in the A. E. F., that the army pharmacopeia contained but two nostrums—castor oil and iodine. You either got dosed with the one or swabbed down with the other, no matter what ailed you.

This, of course, was unjust to a capable and overworked medical staff. But it was an army tradition, just the same—and this Canal Zone case will stir memories of it in the minds of a lot of ex-soldiers.

Chicago teachers, still waiting for their pay, have received another cut. That leaves them owing the city.

Current Play Is Reviewed

EDITOR'S NOTE: The following review was prepared by Mrs. Wade Heath after she read the play last week at a meeting of the Play Readers club.

"Come of Age" had a successful run this season in New York. It was written by Clemence Dane who also wrote "Bill of Divorcement" and "Wild Decembers" and many other popular plays. This, however, is treated in a very different manner from her other plays. Judikh Anderson takes the part of the woman on the stage and Stephen Haggard plays the boy. There are two other important characters. Death and The River.

The scene opens in a small flat

Haggard plays the boy. There are two other important characters, Death and The River.

The scene opens in a small flat in the 18th Century London with a boy of seventeen who has just taken his life. Death enters and calls him to come. The boy was a child genius, but when the public discovered his wonderful poems were written by a mere child, it turned against him. Consequently, he almost starved to death, causing him to take poison rather than is suffer so. He tells Death that he is not of age, so could not be sent to Hell. He is allowed to come to life again until he is of age; to know pain and pleasure. But the understanding is that if he ever reveals his secret, on that instant he must follow death.

The boy lives again in twentieth century London and falls very much in love with a woman twice his age. She returns his love but is jealous of his youth. One night at a party, because of a slight misunderstanding she offers to sell him at auction. This breaks the boy's heart. The woman begs forgiveness and assures him of her love. In attempting to prove his love, he tells her his secret on his twenty-first birthday. When Death calls him this time, he goes willingly because he has known life and takes love with him.

Man has done more in the last 5000 discovered with a small flat in the first and takes love with him.

Tommy, seriously injured from his leap, is taken to the hospital.
Mary, unaware of what has happened, is visited by the police, who believed he jumped from her room.
She rushes to the hospital. Tommy asks her to kiss him. She does as she might kiss a sick child. A correspondent of a New York sensational paper has sneaked in after her and snaps the picture. She telephoned Lord Rexford she may be involved in a sensational story. He tells her he sympathizes with her and will understand.

Arrived.

As soon as Tommy was able to travel, he went to London. He was genuinely sorry for the trouble he had caused Mary. Wild he was, dissolute perhaps—but he was not without decency and aside from his infatuation for Mary, he had a real and deep affection for her. He wrote, he wired he telephoned her. But he received no answer to any of his messages.

received ho answer to any of his messages!

Mary was in a panic the day of Philip's arrival. Over and over she cold herself he had promised her to understand. Again and again she assured herself she had done nothing really wrong. But it was all in vain. Never had she realized how much she loved her husband until the terror smote her heart that she might be losing him forever.

There was so much excitement at his arrival—Pamela in high spirits at seeing her father again, reporters to be seen, important messages which needed immediate attention, that any real talk between husband and wife had to be postponed.

She had arranged that they should line alone in her sitting room before the fire. She had given great thought to the dinner, which consisted of his favorite dishes. She was setting the stage well, she told herself bitterly. While Philip was disposing of the pressing business, she went to the nursery. She always sat with Pamela while she had her supper and was put to bed, but tonight she stayed longer than usual. sat with Pameia while she had her supper and was put to bed, but to-night she stayed longer than usual. She adored the child, as did Philip. Surely, she told her anxious heart, that was a bond between them which must hold through anything which must hold through anything and everything.

They could talk of casual things only while they dined. Eut when the servants had left them alone in the room, they could put off no longer the one thing which was on both their minds. In answer to Mary's saying she wanted to explain a few things, Philip answered brusequely that if she was referring to anything about the Cannes episode, he did not want to hear it.

"But you must, Philip," Mary cried. "It is not fair to me not to listen."

"Mary, how could you get mixed up with anything like this Trent chap? It's all so mucky—and those awful stories in the Sunday supplements—pictures of women who had been in his life—and my wife's with a question mark over it?"

"It must have been horrible for you, Philip. I can't tell you how sorry I am, how ashamed that I did anything, however innocently, to bring you such mortification. It has almost killed me."

There was a silence. Then Mary gasped suddenly: "Philip, you never thought for one moment, did you, that I was one of Tommy's adventures?"

"I didn't let myself think—I idn't dare to."
"Which means that you did think—that you did doubt me. Oh Philip, ow could you—after our love for ach other—after five years—after lamela?"

That is why he tried to jump to my balcony. It may have been indiscreet, under the circumstances for me to go to the hospital. But you, Philip, I am sure, would stand by an old friend when he was in trouble—perhaps near death—no matter what he had done. The kiss which that sneaky reporter snapped, was one of friendship only and of forgiveness for what he had done. "What had gone before?" Philip demanded. "Why did he come to your room. What made him think you would admit him?"

"I wrote you all that—everything. I told you of the party. I admitted we had been foolish and over-gay. I had been having a good time. It all seemed innocent to me, as it was. Then when he kissed me, I was panic-stricken—and I ran away."

"I was just thinking that."
"Slap me in the face!—why don't you? Shout! Knock me down! Kill me! Anything but this."
Philip had risen from his chair and saying he had important matters to attend to with his secretary, ters to attend to with his secretary, started for the door. Mary blocked his way.

"You can't leave me like this," she said quietly. "I have some rights. I've told you the whole story. I am—shall we call it 'intact'. Does that mean anything to you?"

When he did not answer except to move away from her, she said: "Philip, what is it you want?"

"The truth," he said and was gone.

There was desperation on Mary's face. She stood for a minute as stunned. Then she walked to the telephone, called a number and when the connection was made, said a few words. She went downstairs and sat in the empty drawing room When a few minutes later, a car stopped in front of the house, she went to the door and, herself, ad-
