When you want anything in the drug line don't forget to go to the Tahoka Drug Store.

H. C. Crie & Co., have been publishing the Lynn County News for a year, and if the citizens will continue to stay with us we will stay with them, and we will enlarge the paper just as soon as our support will justify us to do so. We have our little all invested in this plant and we will put every thing the paper brings in, into material so that we can give you better service and keep up with the development of the country. We thank our many friends for their hearty support given us so far.

FOR TAX ASSESSOR.

In this issue we are authorized to announce Mr. J. N. Jones as candidate for the office of Tax Assessor for Lynn County Texas. Mr. Jones was one of our first settlers so is too well known to the earlier comers for us to need to say much about his qualifications for this responsible office and to the latter comers we will say that all Mr. Jones asks is to be able to make their acquaintance and he will do the rest. Mr. Jones promises that if he is elected he will do his best to fill the office to the satisfaction of all parties concerned.

Mr. Doak Withdraws.

Lynn County News.

Mr. Editor:—

Will you kindly give me a short space in the columns of your paper to thank the good people of Lynn county for their sufferage and support in the past.

And to tender to the values of the County my thanks for the friendly manifestation in the re-election that is to come off this year.

In withdrawing my name from the public as a candidate for the office of Sheriff and Tax Collector of Lynn county it is nothing but right that I make known my reason for so doing and sum the matter up. I will say that my private business needs all my time and I hope my friends will consider it improper in me for withdrawing from the race as we have plenty of good material in the County for this office.

Again thanking you for the friendship and support in the past. I am ever your friend

C. H. Doak.

Mr. B. B. Wise favored the Lynn County News with his subscription and sent three complimentary papers to his friends abroad.

The Tahoka Hotel had 67 guests for breakfast Tuesday and 105 for dinner. A lady made the remark that she had been told that West Texas was not settled up much but she was convinced that she had been misinformed.

The backbone of the drought of Lynn and adjoining counties was broken by a rain Thursday.

"The Little Man With the Whiskers."

"The two lovely faces," laughed my mistress, blowing a kiss to me.

My master smiled, and twirled his mustache, and looked so happy that I wanted to know what it all meant, and trotted up to them to find out, when Patrick must needs come up and chuck me off to breakfast. I was very mad, for I hated not to know what it was all about.

After that morning things changed a little. My master was never at home any more. The talks under the willow were over, and I only saw him in the early morning when he would come out with a high hat and gloves on and pat me in absent-minded way, and say to my mistress.

"You don't mind my going to town to-day, do you, darling. Now that things are beginning to look brighter for us I ought to go round amongst the boys a little."

My mistress used to smile and say she liked him to go, but I noticed that after he had said the same thing every morning for about six weeks, my mistress smiled less and seemed to be less cheerful when she told him she liked to have him go.

Quite a wet spell came after this. I saw nothing at all of my mistress, but I used to see my master driving away with James and Patrick as usual. It worried me to know what was the matter. James could not tell me any thing, and none of the dogs came to the barn, so I absolutely knew nothing. I could not stand it, and set to work to call my mistress with all my might the first morning that it was fine enough for her to get out.

Some hours passed—I kept on calling, but nobody came. At last Patrick put his head over the fence.

"That calf beats all!" was all he said, and disappeared.

A few moments later out came my mistress. Her eyes were red, she had evidently been crying. She came up to me and I was so sorry to see her sad that I tucked her hand and tried to comfort her. At this she broke down completely, and laying her head on my neck began to cry.

"Oh, Ethel, Ethel!" she said, "he doesn't love us any more! He isn't happy with us any more! He is restless and wretched until he can get away from us. Now that he has nothing but praise from everybody and there isn't a critic left to abuse him he has no use for us. When I longed for a critic to find out his worth I little thought I was longing for the wrecking of my own happiness!"

She seemed so unhappy that I began to cry too, for sympathy.

"Mistress," I said, "just show me what a critic is like and you shan't have to cry any more, I will take care of you."

Before she could reply Patrick came through the gate.

"Well, he do bawl!" he said. "I guess I'd better change his food."

"Is any thing the matter with her?" asked my mistress, starting up.

"I dunno," Patrick replied, "he's been bawling that way all mornin'. Faint for the want of food, he's fat enough. Mebbe he's lonesome. A man's never done foolin' with a calf that's been reared by wimmin'."

"Poor little thing may be she misses her master," said my mistress.

"Humph!" said Patrick. "He's a lad, he is! If he keeps up that bawling I'll give him some condition powder and have done with him."

My mistress turned away, not heeding my indignant protest, and I was left to my fate.

After she had gone in I was very much troubled. I hated to see my dear, good, kind mistress unhappy, and I wanted to help her, but how could I when all her trouble came from a critic, and I didn't even know what a critic was like.

I asked the chickens. They couldn't tell me.

I asked the neighbor's cow: she had never heard of such a thing.

I asked James. He said he supposed it must be a dealer in poor oats, for that was the only thing he could think of which could possibly make a person cry.

I asked the dogs.

The puppies giggled, but my mistress' pet dog, Sport, a very arrogant Cocker Spaniel, who thinks himself clever, paused a moment to throw an answer at me over his shoulder; he was too superior to waste much time on me, and this is what he said:

"A critic is the only person who can make my mistress cry."

"But—" I asked, "what is he like?"

Sport gave an angry bark.

"I have told you all you need to know," he said, "if you are not smart enough to think the rest out for yourself, I am sorry I wasted my breath over you."

Sport walked into the house, and I recommenced on my end, while I thought.

At last it was all as clear as daylight to me. A critic was the only person who could make my mistress cry, so if I ever saw any one make my mistress cry I might be sure it was a critic, and all I had to do was to horn him, and trample him to pieces, and then my dear mistress would never cry again.

I jumped and began to practice with my new horns on the willow tree to see if they would dent it, they didn't seem to hurt it much, but I resolved to use them every day so that I would be quite ready for a critic when it came.

Time passed on. I never saw my master, and there was no sitting under the brook, no tender embraces under the shadow of the trees. My mistress came every now and then, but she had grown silent and sad and hardly ever petted me.

One afternoon the gate opened. I looked up hoping to see both my friends, but it was only my mistress and a little dark man with whiskers. They came over beside me and sat down under the willow.

"It is a shame," he was saying, "for you to be left here alone day after day like this."

"No," she answered, "you find me a little dull, I suppose, because I have been so long accustomed to have him with me that I don't quite understand how to do without him yet—but I shall learn," and she gave a sigh that went right to my heart.

"If I had such a home and such a wife you wouldn't catch me leaving them," he said.

"Oh yes," she answered, with a sort of feeble imitation of her old merry laugh, "if you had ever such a nice home you would find its hold on you very slight when art called you from it."

"Art doesn't often call so loudly nowadays."

"What do you mean?"

"The call of pleasure is often disguised under the call of art."

My mistress turned on him with angry eyes.

"Do you mean to hint that my husband leaves me for his own enjoyment—or for any other reason than the furthering of his work?"

"Don't let's talk personalities," said the little man with the whiskers.

"But we must. You mean something personal."

"Indeed you are mistaken—I was speaking generally—with so many husbands the call of art comes in the shape of golden hair, a girlish figure, and a pretty foot, and I was merely mentioning the fact."

My mistress sprang to her feet.

"You are a bad man," she said. "Go—I never want to speak to you again!"

With a few hurried steps she reached the garden gate, and had passed in out of sight and slammed the gate behind her.

The little man with the whiskers stood watching her, gave a short laugh, and walked away down the road.
