Over nine hundred dollars of the loan will be spent in excavating the new well, some $200 for labor in concrete work, $175 for labor in brick work, $100 for installation of pump and $50 for electric wiring.

A. B. Newman, Pioneer
Of County Is Buried
At Matador Tuesday

Deeds of Kindness and Sacrifice
Part of County's Early History

Beyond the horizon of wind-swept hills of the country he loved and into the wider ranges of eternity, the spirit of Dr. A. B. Newman was lifted late Sunday when word reached Matador of his passing.

As one of Motley county's pioneer citizens and beloved characters, Mr. Newman was known to the early settler and cowboy alike, a friend to everyone who needed aid. His deeds of kindness and sacrifice are part of the county's early history. Although he did not possess a doctor's license, Mr. Newman gave of his skill and medicine kit all that was possible to the early community. Perhaps no individual gave more unselfishly of his time, his goods and his services to the needs of the struggling pioneer country than did the kindly man known to everyone as 'Dr.' Newman.

Born in Kentucky February 14, 1846, A. D. Newman, when only 12 years of age, moved with his parents to Ellis county, Texas. One year later his family moved to Parker county. In 1871 he was married to Miss Sara Campbell and to this union nine children were born, three of whom are still living, Mrs. E. C. Harris and Raldo Newman of Matador and Raldo Newman of San Angelo, Texas. Mrs. Newman died December 1, 1928.

Mr. Newman was converted to the Baptist Church in early life. Moving to Whiteflat with his family in 1890, he became a charter member of the Whiteflat Baptist Church.

In later years he moved to Matador where he made his home until the time of his death. Besides a host of friends, he is survived by three children, eleven grand-children and nine great-grandchildren.

Funeral services were held at the Baptist church at 3 p. m. Tuesday and interment made in East Mound cemetery.

TRAIL DUST

Allowed the benefit of 'doubt by my wife and severest critic on my claim to be more or less human, I believe I can account for all of my emotions with the exception of one. I have cried for the sheer joy of crying and I have been exceedingly happy many times. I have been scared half to death and I have been in love to the point of refusing food. I have had a few encounters with spirits furmenti that have left me nonplused. I have been angry with myself and others. The one particular hour or more of my life, which I often recall and wonder about must have occurred when I was about fifteen altho the age is not material. It was spring or early summer and a light rain had fallen the night before. The field was soft and green. On a particular high hill of my father's farm there is a place where the view to the north has always held enchantment for me. The rugged red hills of Tongue river dotted with evergreens and the white sandy river bed that always reflects the sunlight at a certain time in the morning. It was in this position that I stood a long time and watched the phantom silver clouds go by and breathed deeply of clean rain-scented air. Presently I lay flat on my back and looked at the sky, one bare leg and one arm crossed over the other. Never before or since have I been so utterly at peace with the world. Never before or since has life been so sublimely sweet. Altho much time has passed since that enchanted hour, I remember distinctly of reflecting upon both life and death and there was no fear of either. There was a sweet clean world... a Mocking Bird hid in the foliage of a distant Hackberry tree singing, and life to live.

One's vanity can hardly receive a greater blow than to be away from home for considerable time and then some wag instead of asking the usual questions, say, after you have been forced to tell him of your absence, "Why, I didn't know you had been away." Of course it's the fact that we are not nearly so important as we think we are, being thrust in our face, but it hurts.

It was in the club car of the California Limited where I first beheld the strange spectacle of a woman smoking a cigarette. I looked over my newspaper shyly much as a small boy's bewilderment on his first visit to the zoo. I felt sorry for the woman because every man in the car was looking at her. I even considered telling her of the fact, but growing older since then, I am glad that I didn't because she possibly knew it.

Just when I was ready to be contented with my black and white spotted neck-tie, Nelson the human Linotype at the Tribune plant, said it looked like the flanks of a bird dog.

Hollywood

If I were allowed only one word to express my reactions to "Little Women," it would be either "weepy" or "gripping." That your eyes will gather a suspicious moisture—that something will reach out from the screen and grip your heart, there is no question. Kathryn Hepburn has again covered herself with glory. Her characterization of "Jo" is a work of fine shadings—nuances—of light and shade, of happiness and of sorrow. Tomboyish she is, but a loveable tomboy. In "Little Women" she has again added another gem to her histrionic collection.

Jean Parker as "Beth" is a close second for acting honors. She makes Beth a tender, loving soul housed in a frail body, so frail, in fact, that it is unable to retain her lovely spirit for long. Her death scene is not maudlin, but strong in repression and most poignant in feeling. The other two girls do not come up in characterization or appeal to these.

Edna May Oliver as the rich, but irascible old aunt is, to my thinking, her finest performance. It is incively etched into your memory.

The lover next door, played by Douglass Montgomery, was well done and adequate, but Paul Lucas as the German professor who eventually marries Jo, was by far the best male portrayal. In tenderness and mellowness it somehow reminded me of David Warfield in his unforgettable "Music Master."

See this picture, by all means, when it comes your way, it is a great picture inspired by a still greater book. I'm sure were Louisa May Alcott on earth now

First of U.S. Exports for 1934

These four American girls, reading left to right, Marion Delman, Orvild Henson, Majaro Williams and Patti Patton, are among the first of U.S. Exports for 1934, having been selected from thousands of chorus girls to go to Europe for appearance in the Monte Carlo Folies, in London and Monte Carlo.

she would be pleased with it. Although nothing happens out of the ordinary, you will see the simple joys and sorrows of an average family, and it is in this universal appeal wherein lies its greatness.

Did You, Perhaps, Know That:

The Paramount Studios cover 26 acres of ground; the M. G. M. Studios 53 acres; Warner Bros. 78 acres and Fox 110 acres?

"Hollywood," so called, as it pertains to picturedom, includes, also, Beverly Hills, where the majority of players live, Universal City, where is located Carl Laemmle's pride, the Universal Studio; Culver City, where M.

G. M., Pathe and Hal Roach Studios are located; Santa Monica, where many stars have palatial beach homes; Malibu Beach, where others have their beach homes, and Palm Springs, where they go to "rest," as they call it, and Agua Caliente, in Mexico, where many race their horses and drink mineral water. The air port from which they start when they take trips in their own airplanes—that they refer to as their "ships," and some of them go to Nevada, Arizona or Mexico for their divorces. In its last analysis, Hollywood is really a state of mind.

Stuart Holmes, besides being an actor, is also a fine artist. I have seen some of his pictures at the Los Angeles Museum, and they remind me in their general character of the pictures of Paul Gauguin, partially clothed natives of the South Seas in their native habitat of lush and tropical vegetation. Mr. Holmes also told me that he was very much interested in astrology.

John Gilbert's fourth matrimonial venture has wrecked itself upon the rocks. Careers and matrimony, it seems are like oil and water—they just won't mix.

Greta Garbo will not work after five o'clock in the afternoon. She is not very strong, constantly taking tonics, she does this in order to conserve her strength. Noise, of any kind is her greatest bugaboo and she dislikes gaping strangers above all else. She is really very shy but very kind and thoughtful in her dealings with those with whom she comes in contact. They like her very much. There are in reality two Garbos, the one some press agents, who have never met her, write about, and the real one, that few people know, except those who have had the privilege of working with her. Her latest picture, "Queen Christina," has again established her as a very great artist.

MELLOWED 80 MILLION YEARS
...hence requiring less oil per mile!
Little is really understood about the complicated ingredients which make up petroleum crude oils. But this one fact has been proven time and again: By and large the older a crude oil is, the finer motor oil it will make—and the fewer quarts you will have to add on long trips. Sinclair Opaline Motor Oil is refined and blended from the oldest Mid-continent paraffin-base crudes, mellowed and filtered in the earth for an average of 80 million years—so say geologists. In process of manufacture, Sinclair chills Sinclair Opaline down to as low as 60° F. below zero in order to remove the non-lubricating petroleum jelly. Sinclair Opaline is all lubricant—no waste. Try a crankcaseful. Note how seldom you need to add oil.

1934 Cotton Program Progressing Slowly; Jan. 31 Closing Date

Steady progress is being made in the cotton sign-up campaign now under way in Motley county, according to reports from local committees engaged in making out the contracts. All contracts must be signed by Jan. 31.

Up to noon Wednesday, 127 contracts had been turned in to the county agent's office, in which 7410 acres had been rented to the government. This is about one third of the acreage which should be obtained in the county.

Several factors have operated to slow the actual signing of the contracts. Chief among these are the difficulties of obtaining accurate figures of acreage and production during the base period, and the delay in arriving at agreements between landlords and tenants. County agent, Frank A. Buckley, urges that landlords and tenants take time, even at some inconvenience, to collect the figures and make agreements. In some cases where this is impossible before the closing date, the landlord or the tenant should sign a blank contract, and the details can be completed during the first week of February.

The probability of compulsory legislation by the present Congress was stressed by John R. Edmonds, district agent of the A & M Extension Service, when he was in Matador Wednesday. "This program will succeed one way or the other," Mr. Edmonds said. "Those who refuse to cooperate by voluntary agreement will have their ginning limited to their allotment but will not receive any payment," he warned. Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, sounded the same warning in his radio address Tuesday night. He pointed out that the Bankhead bill, now before Congress would apply only to those who do not enter the voluntary contract.

T. E. Long Candidate For Re-Election Office County Commissioner

The Tribune is authorized to announce the name of T. E. Long as candidate for re-election to the office of county Commissioner of precinct number 4, in this issue.

Regarding his announcement, Commissioner Long said: "I wish, first, to thank the voters who supported me in the former race, which I made on an economy platform. In conformity with that I voted for a 10 per cent reduction in the valuation of taxable property and for a 7 cent reduction of the road and bridge rate would have reflected a very material reduction in tax payments if the State had not increased its rate."

I invite the voters to inspect the records on expenditures as made by myself. I am perfectly willing to let the record speak for itself. If I am elected to office again, I pledge the same policy of economy in the future."

SYNOPSIS

Tom Jordan, young New England newspaper reporter, to win the hand of his sweetheart, Jessica, must match her small fortune with his own. To do this, he has a hope of wealth from the salvage of a long-sunken French corvette. Two Frenchmen, the comte de Corlay and his son Robert, claim an ancestor of theirs commanded the Fourquet (the corvette) when she sank, and left record of treasure on board, which they assert, as his descendants, is their property. A sailor, Sebastian, also knows of the treasure, and is seeking it.

"No," Tom said slowly, "I thought there might be ship's money or plate or some plunder taken off pirates he was chasing before they ordered her to these waters. But what is after is her guns."

Robert, catching his father's eye, said lightly, "There, you see, papa? Didn't I say that her guns would pay the shot, even if we failed to collar our reverend ancestor's booty?" He looked at Tom. "Would you question our right to the latter, Mr. Jordan?"

"Not if you found it first," Tom answered him, "or the guns either, or that matter. In that case I'd want out."

"And if you found her first?" "Well, Lieutenant, I'd have to think that over. I'd say I'd have a heavy salvage claim on whatever was recovered."

"But she is a French ship, Mr. Jordan," the count protested. "More than that, she was a government ship."

Tom shook his head. "She belonged to the French crown. You've since abolished that."

"But we inherit its properties, Mr. Jordan." This from Robert.

"Well, then," said Tom, "in that case you inherit its liabilities with them. The Fourquet, as you know, was ordered here to grab the colony of Pemsquid, over yonder across the bay. Looked at from that slant she is an enemy ship, and you will have to admit you haven't the shadow of a claim on any part of her."

The baffling logic of this point was received by a chuckle from Doctor White. The count muttered "Saprotisti!"—and tugged at his imperial with a bewildered look.

Then Robert burst into a rollicking laugh. "Looks as if we were really well sunk, papa."

Tom relaxed enough to smile, himself. "Cutting out all this bunk, I can't honestly see just where you gentlemen have a look-in. Here we have an ancient wreck on bottom inside the three-mile limit, which is to say, on American soil. As non-citizens of the United States you haven't even the right to fish commercially in these waters."

"But treasure is much different," objected the count. "A foreigner may hunt for treasure, just as he may look for gold or precious stones."

"Well, I guess that's right, sir," Tom admitted, "but in either case findings is keepings, with a rakeoff to the government in the case of treasure. That puts us all on the same mark. Suppose we leave it that way."

Doctor White interrupted at this juncture to invite the foreign treasure seekers to his home. Walking through the woods to the house, Doctor White and the count de Corlay went on ahead, Tom and Robert, who had lingered to carry the boat's kilch above high water mark, followed.

Tom said as they started, "Do you know, this thing's beginning to get my goat, Lieutenant. I guess the next I'll learn is that we've hit on the same gear to locate the wreck."

"Shouldn't wonder. Great minds, you know. Mine's a galvanometer device—"

Tom threw up his hands. "Holy mackerel!" He staggered back against a tree. Robert's dancing eyes played on him with a puzzled expression. "What's struck you?"

"The whole darned shooting match," Tom gave a silent laugh, a pioneer trait inherited from the days when it was poor scouting to indulge audible mirth in the woods. In a few brief words he explained the principles of his own wreck finder.

Robert drew out a gold cigarette case with family arms engraved upon it, offered it to Tom, then, when both had lighted up, said cheerfully, "It's rum, like all this about thought transference. All the same, there must be something to it."

"That's right," Tom agreed.

They started to walk on again, in silence for a little way. Robert paused presently. "This Sebastian is a bad egg. Worse than that, he's an efficient man, trained diver and a and see about it tonight. Are you game, Lieutenant?"

"Rather," said Lieutenant Visconte Robert Jean-Marie Raoul de Corlay. "As your Alabama colonials all say, 'Hot dawg!'"

CHAPTER III

JESSICA, disturbing to any normal male eye in her snug white jersey, was enchanted to meet her guardian's distinguished visitors. "Why don't you work in partnership, and then if what you find is enough for both, divide?" she asked, on learning the situation. "If not, then you might throw dice for it."

"The 50-50 thing suits me all right," said Tom, "but the count might not care for it."

So the proposition was referred to the count de Corlay, who shook his head. "For one thing I am opposed to dicing, and more than that, I am not yet prepared to admit anyone has an equal claim to the personal property of my ancestor."

"Well, then, sir," said Tom, "why not put it this way, that if we locate the Fourquet you are to have all that and I'm to have the guns, which is all I counted on to begin with."

"It would be better, I think," said the count, shifting to French and addressing Bob, "if we were each to pursue his search in all fairness and friendly fashion. Treasure hunting is at the best a ticklish business, and the less there are of complications the better."

To Doctor White the whole situation was fascinating but bizarre by reason of its actuality. He had known always the story of the corvette, but never given it any serious thought. And his guests baffled his habitually clear vision of individual people. He could not be sure about them.

Jessica was entirely at her ease with the visitors. She merged with a curious episode as inconspicuously as a partridge merges with autumn leaves.

Yet Jessica's life had been a sheltered one. Her mother had been the only child of an American missionary to the Society Islands. As a little girl she had lived at the mission, where all contacts naturally were guarded, and at thirteen had been taken to San Francisco and placed in a girl's seminary, where she remained until the death of her mother three years later.

Captain Poole, her father, had then yielded to her entreaty that she be taken with him for a voyage aboard his vessel. He desired to make the better acquaintance of his daughter, and the companionship continued until the beginning of the last illness that compelled him to quit the sea.

Even aboard the big four-master Jessica's life had been no less insulated from evil infection. Warren Poole, a reader and thinker, and the student that some such men become, had devoted leisure moments to her education, though on lines scarcely included in a school curriculum. There had been few topics that he had tabooed. His exposition of social conditions had been wise, clear and clean, based on the protection of knowledge rather than hazardous fortification which is the ignorance of innocence.

Jessica served tea and cakes, and a little later count de Corlay and Robert took their leave, the others walking with them through the woods to the cove where they had left their boat.

When his callers had left, Doctor White slipped off into the woods. Jessica caught up with him just as he reached the point where he and Tom had exchanged their first words with the Frenchmen, and whither his steps now had led him through some subconscious agency.

"Hello," said the doctor, and spun around. "Now what the dickens brought me over here again?"

Jessica laughed. "That's easy, Gurdy. You've been thinking, only you haven't thought it out."

Tom's jaw hardened and his eyes looked into Robert's. "Let's go over

"If Not, Then Throw Dice for It."

crack on deep ground currents and all that sort of thing. He was detailed to one of our mine sweepers based on St. Nazaire, and served aboard her until you Yankees took over the bulk of the job. Then they gave him to me. I sent him down once to look over our propeller after I had wiped it on a rock off Quiberon."

"How did he get wise to this thing?" Tom asked.

"My darn fault. I was in my cabin with my father. There's a speaking tube to the wheel, where Sebastian was on duty. Papa's voice is very clear and distinct, so all Sebastian had to do was to clap a lug to his end of it. It wouldn't have mattered if it had been one of our Bretons, but these infernal provincials are devilish keen. That's how the scoundrel did us. No doubt his plan is to study the currents a bit, then go down in the most promising places and trudge 'round bottom."

Robert's dark fringed eyelids narrowed a little. "Now if we could manage somehow to discourage the rotter—"

Tom's jaw hardened and his eyes looked into Robert's. "Let's go over

MOVIE CHATTER

Popeye, Popeye, Popeye, before I forget it I better tell you we have another Popeye comedy for Sunday and Monday. The title of this one is 'I Yam What I Yam;' good old Popeye, the man with a pile driver fisk, that eats his spinach and pops big Bluto.

Now I want to tell you sempin folks; we have been having a good many Zane Grey westerns on Friday and Saturday, and you might think by this that there was enough of them produced to last a fellow every Friday-Saturday in the year, but such is not the case. Paramount produces only six a year and Fox four, so you can see that even from the two, two-year groups we have about used up all those Zane Greys; all of which was leading up to this: We have another Zane Grey this week end, George O'Brien in "The Last Trail." I just want everybody to see this picture that likes Zane Grey, because pretty soon they are all going to be gone.

Sunday and Monday we are playing "Torch Singer," starring Claudette Colbert. Now listen, this is just a program picture and is not extraordinarily big, but you remember some of those program pictures are better than some with a lot of advertising, and that's just the case here. "Torch Singer," I know is an exceedingly good picture, a lot better than Paramount thought it would be when they made it. I heartily recommend this picture to you—besides Popeye will meet you that day.

We had a delightful day at the Methodist church last Sunday. Splendid congregations at both morning and evening services. Rev. W. L. Tittle brought a fine message to an appreciative congregation at the evening service. Some one had the face to tell the pastor that he was preaching better of late. When you get interested and inspire him with your presence and he doesn't preach better, WELL he is just hopeless.

We are anxious to meet you in the services of the church, come Sunday and add your bit to the success of the service, you can surely stand it for just one hour. In the morning we will discuss the topic, "A Search for the Best." At the evening hour, "A Painted Face."
