Don't Stop Short Of Protecting Cropland

By Kevin L. Wright
Small grains interseeded into cotton can provide many benefits to the landowner. According to the local Soil Conservation Service, this interseeding protects land from erosion and provides needed agricultural products. Motley County farmers seeded approximately 12,000 acres of small grains this past fall, with a large percent being interseeded into cotton. The small grains produced adequate cover to control wind erosion and as an added benefit increased organic matter in the soil. This cover could not come at a better time since over 60% of Motley County's damaging windstorms come between October and March. To insure adequate soil protection with these crops, they must be left on the soil surface until April 1. This will allow time for small grains to produce adequate residues. The residues can then be worked into soil to increase organic matter and improve soil tilth. With proper management, interseeded small grains can improve a farmer's cotton yield, while protecting his soil from erosion. For more information about interseeding small grains as a conservation practice, contact the Soil Conservation Service in Motley County Court-house.

Dear Editor:
I was very much interested in the different rattlesnake stories. When my girls and I were living in Solana, New Mexico, we had just moved into our house and as yet had no screen doors. The weather was hot and the doors were left open at night. One morning there was a strange noise coming from our kitchen. When I investigated, behind a wooden box was a full-grown skunk. I knew if I tried to get that creature out, the results would be horrible. My sister lived close by and her husband, a very good man to have around in an emergency, came and in a very simple manner quickly and quietly drove that skunk out of our house and then killed it. You'd better believe the very next thing done for our house were screen doors.

New Life

By Bob Cozby
Pastor Of The Assembly
Of God Church

Glory to the Lord of hosts, that sin is still sin, and a life of holiness and favor with God is still a life of holiness and favor with God. They never have switched places and they never will. If God had made a middle road, an in-between, a fence to sit on, I believe every man and woman would have taken that and not chosen to seek for the goodness of God and believed for an eternal home in glory.

Man has a built in laziness and procrastination. Yes, we are good at putting off the eternal matters and decisions that will decide our destiny for ever and ever.

How many multiple hundreds of thousands of anguishing and fearful cries and excuses will God and the redeemed hear on that dreadful day? "I meant to - I was going to. I didn't have enough time. I was too busy. I didn't really know who Jesus was, what he had done for me because he loved me."

"I had my letter at the First Church, I put in a dollar on Christmas and Easter, when I went. What about my mother, she always went to church and I know she prayed for me, doesn't that count?"

"But I was a hardshell fundamentalist." Now folks, you weren't hardshell anything, just hard hearted. God made available to you at a very costly price to him, but free to you, a heart of flesh to write his tender laws upon, but you allowed Satan to blind and bind you, to deceive you.

Are we transgressing the laws of the Creator of all, and hoping He won't notice, hoping He won't care, hoping everything will be alright? After all, God is love. How can he permit me to go to hell?

To sum it up, God has invited us to go to heaven. Is it His fault if we ignore the invitation? We have been given the right to choose. Don't be a fence straddler. God didn't make a middle road that goes toward Heaven.
