Rescue Parties Follow Path Of Water Avalanche

CORPUS CHRISTI, Tex., Nov. 24.—After an inspection of the area below the $2,500,000 La Grulla dam which broke yesterday, authorities today announced that no lives had been lost and that property damage would not run as high as at first estimated.

Nearly all of the water was out of the lake this morning. The bottom could be seen in many places. The Nueces river below had receded enough at La Fruita to allow residents to return to their homes there.

Southern Pacific railroad service through La Fruita was resumed today after workers had labored all night repairing washed out approaches to the trestle there. The water was expected to fall enough at Bluntzer today to allow the residents there to return.

CORPUS CHRISTI, Tex., Nov. 24.—Parties of rescue workers set out at dawn today to survey flood ravaged farmlands of the fertile Nueces river valley after an avalanche of water, liberated by breaking of the La Grulla dam near here yesterday, had inundated the whole section.

No deaths had been reported, advance warnings of the dam's cracking having been given farmers in ample time for them to flee from their homes. Fear was felt, however, that isolated groups of hunters might have been trapped by the torrent which swept everything from the 28 mile long strip it covered.

Property damage, as yet unestimated, will reach far over a million dollars. More than 2,000 homes were washed away. Crops throughout the entire area were destroyed. At least 2,000 heads of cattle, thousands of chickens and uncountable heads of other stock were drowned.

Two villages, La Fruita (Cq.) and Bluntzer, were under 10 feet of water. The torrent was released from Lake Lovenskiold, source of Corpus Christi's water supply 40 miles to the northwest, when a large leak was made in the dam at noon Sunday.

A large section of the dam lay in ruins. A section 200 feet wide had been washed out, the earthen embankments destroyed and the concrete supports pounded away by the water.

Waters from Lake Lovenskiold, a 7000 acre body of water conservatory of the Nueces River by the dam, were surging into Corpus Christi Bay 28 miles away, their destruction of all habitation along the way complete.

Accounts of heroism and a vain battle against the crumbling walls of the dam came from the stricken countryside along with descriptions of the damage.

As German Air Liner Lande In English Harbor

The DO-X, massive German flying boat shown here on its first visit to British waters, off Calshot, England, en route on what was planned to be a flight to New York. It was from this harbor, near Southampton, that the Prince of Wales inspected the craft and, during a half-hour flight, personally handled the controls.

After a four-day visit, the Dornier plane, which has a wing-spread of 157 feet, proceeded to Bordeaux, France with Spain, Portugal, the Azores, Bermuda and New York still on its itinerary. Before setting out for New York, it was said that eight new motors of 900 horsepower each would be installed in place of the twelve with which it is now equipped.

WACO, Tex., Nov. 24.—After they had bound and gagged a night watchman, two burglars knocked the knob from the Sanger Bros. department store safe here last midnight and escaped with approximately $5,000.

The safe contained nearly $10,000, the management said, of which a part was in checks. None of the checks were taken.

C. C. Matheny, the watchman, was making his round when the night bell rang. Two men confronted him with guns as he approached the front door, he told police. The intruders trussed him up, carried him to the third floor and chained him by the neck to a post outside the office while they did their work, he said.

After they left, he worked the chain loose and telephoned police. L. L. Doughton, general manager of the store, said today the less was covered by burglary insurance. The means of entrance used by the burglars had not been discovered today.

Final Count Is Made Today With Party One Ahead

CHICAGO, Nov. 24.—A Republican majority in the house of representatives in the December, 1931, congress—barring alterations through deaths, recounts or other now unforeseen factors—was assured today when official canvass in the tenth Illinois district was completed, giving the seat there to Rep. Carl Chindblom, Republican.

The canvass showed Chindblom, Republican incumbent, had received 72,928 votes; William Heese, Democrat, 70,621; Chindblom's majority 2,307.

This single district had been in doubt since the election and since it was originally counted as Democrats, today's final figures made the house line-up: Republicans 218, Democrats 216, Farmer-Labor 1.

Based on past experience, the house lineup is likely to be altered further before December, 1931. But on the basis of these returns the Republicans will be able to organize the lower body of congress.

The canvass figures will be officially certified tomorrow to the Secretary of State.

When "Bonnie" Dundee induces on Penny Crain, the district attorney's secretary, she tells him she is going to the Saturday
luncheon of the Forsyth Club, given by an honorary member, Juanita Selim. Dundee sees that Penny was forced to leave because of her father's business failure and disappearance.
Nita is now resting in the house
rain had built from Judge Marshall, who, Penny hints, has fallen ill. Dundee drives Penny to the luncheon, and Nita, at first very friendly, is frightened on hearing of a detective. Late that afternoon Nita is murdered. At the luncheon house, where Captain Strawn is already in charge, Dundee sees Nita bowed over her dining table, where she was shot through the heart, as she powdered her face. Dundee objects to Strawn's theory that she was shot through the window. Strawn agrees to let Dundee question the witness, and he goes into the living room to do so.

CHAPTER IV

"Goodbye, dinner" croaned the pomp, blond little man who had been introduced as Tracey Miles, he sorrowfully patted his rather prominent stomach.

"Don't worry, darling," begged the thin, dark, neurotic-looking woman who was Flora Miles, his wife. "I'm sure Mr. Dundee will find Lydia—poor Nita's maid, who Dundee explained in an aside to Tracey Miles—'to prepare a light supper for us if he really needs to stay in our home—which I am sure he won't.'"

"How can you think of food now?" Polly Beale, the tall, sturdy girl with an almost masculine bob and a quite masculine tweed suit, demanded brusquely. Her voice had an unfeeling lack of modulation, but when Dundee saw her glance toward Clive Hammond he realized that, in spite of appearance, she was wholly feminine where he was concerned, at least
"Of course, we are all DREAD-FULLY cut up over poor Nita's death," gasped a rather pretty girl, whose most distinguishing feature was her crop of clinky, light-red hair.

"I assume that to be true, Miss Hammond," Dundee answered.
"But we must lose no more time talking at the facts. Just when did Mrs. Selim murder?"

"At the brutal use of the word a sadder rippled over the small

By Blosser

crowd. Dexter Sprague, "of New York," dropped his lighted cigar where it would have burned a hole in a fine Persian rug, if Sergeant Turner, on guard over the room for Captain Strawn, had not slouched from his corner to plant a big foot upon it.

"We don't know exactly when it happened," Penny volunteered. "We were playing bridge, the last half of the last rubber, because the men were arriving for cocktails, when Nita became dumpy and went to her bedroom to—"

"To make herself 'pretty-pretty' for the men," Mrs. Drake mimicked; then, realizing her cattiness and its possible effect on Dundee, she defended herself volubly: "Of course I LIKED Nita, but she DID think so terribly much about her effect on men—and all that, and besides—you CAN'T suspect me, because I was playing against Karen and Nita—"

"Thank you, Mrs. Drake," Dundee cut in. "Does anyone know the exact time Mrs. Selim left the room, when she became dumpy?"

"I can tell you, because I had just arrived—the first of the men to get here," Tracey Miles volunteered. "Mrs. Selim—had said 5:30. Well, it was exactly 5:20, so I had five minutes to spare."

"Yes?" Dundee speeded him up impatiently.

"Well, I came right into the hall and hung my hat in the closet out there, and then came in here. It must have been about 5:27 by that time," he explained, with the meticulousness of a man on the witness stand. "I shouted, 'Hello, everybody! How's tricks?'... That's a joke, you know. 'How's tricks'—in a n i n g tricks in bridge—"

"Yes, yes," Dundee admitted, frowning, but the rest of the company exchanged indulgent smiles, and Flora Miles patted her husband's hand fondly and proudly.

"Well, Nita jumped up from the bridge table—that one right there," Miles pointed to the table nearer the arched doorway, "and she said, 'Good heavens! Is it half-past five already? I've got to run and make myself 'pretty-pretty' for just such great big men as you, Tracey—'"

"Tracey, darling!" Judge Marshall corrected, with a chuckle that sounded odd in the tensely silent room.

Tracey Miles flushed a salmon pink, and his wife's fingers clutched at his hand warningly. "Oh, Nita called everybody darling, and didn't mean anything by it, I guess," he explained uneasily.

"Just one of her cute little ways—Well, anyway, she came up to me and straightened my necktie—another one of her funny little ways—and said, 'Tracey, my OWN lamb, won't you shape up the cocktails for poor little Nita?'"

"You know, a sort of way she had of coaxing people—"

"Yes, I know," Dundee agreed, with a trace of a grin. "Go on, as rapidly as you can, please."

"I thought you wanted to know everything!" Miles was a little peevish; he had evidently been enjoying himself. "Of course, I said I'd make the cocktails—she said everything was ready on the sideboard. That's the dining room right behind this room," he explained unnecessarily, because the French doors had been thrown open.

"Well, Nita blew me a kiss from her fingertips and ran out of the room. Now, let's see," he ruminated, creasing his sunburned forehead beneath his carefully combed blond hair, "that must have been at exactly 5:30 that she left the room. I went on into the dining room, and Lois—I mean Mrs. Dunlap—came with me, because she said she was simply dying for a varlar sandwich and a sip of—" rected, that Dundee broke in suddenly:

"I want a connected story of the events leading up to the tragedy. And I want someone to tell it who hasn't lost his—or her—head at all."

He looked about the company, as it speculatively, but his mind was already made up. "Miss Crain,

"Of Scotch, Tracey," Lois Dunlap cut in, grinning. "I'm sure Mr. Dundee won't think I'm a confirmed tippler, so you might as well tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. Poor Tracey has a deadly fear that we are all going to lose the last shred of our reputations in this deplorable affair, Mr. Dundee," she added in a rather shaky version of the comfortable, rich voice he had heard earlier in the day.

"I'm not going to pry into cellars," Dundee assured her in the same spirit. "What else, Mr. Miles?"

"Nothing much," Tracey Miles confessed, with apparent regret. "I was still mixing—no, I'd begun to shake the cocktails—when I heard a scream."

"Whose scream?" Dundee demanded, looking about the room, and dismissing Miles thankfully.

"It was—I," Judge Marshall's fair-haired, blue-eyed little bride volunteered in a voice that threatened to rise to hysteria.

"Tell me all about it," Dundee urged gently.

"Yes, sir," she quavered, while her husband's arm encircled her shoulders in courtly fashion. "As Tracey told you, Nita was dumpy, and I was declarer—that is, I got the bid, and played the hand. It—it was quite an exciting end for me to the afternoon of bridge, for I'm not usually awfully lucky, so when Penny had figured up the score, because I'm not good at arithmetic, and I knew Nita and I had rolled up an awfully big score, I jumped up and ran into her room to tell her the good news, because she hadn't come back. And—there she was—all bowed over her dressing table, she—she was—"

"She was dead when you reached her?" Dundee assisted her.

"Yes," Karen Marshall answered faintly, and turned to hide her face against her elderly husband's breast.

Dundee's swift eyes took in the varying degrees of whiteness and sick horror that claimed every face in the room. Tracey Miles looked as if he would have no immediate craving for his dinner, and Judge Marshall's fine, thin face no longer looked so "well-preserved" as he prided himself that it did. As for Dexter Sprague, he almost folded up against the coral brocade draperies. It was the women, oddly enough, who kept the better control over their emotions.

"Of course you all rushed in when Mrs. Marshall screamed?" he asked casually.

Twelve heads nodded mutely. "Did any or all of you touch the—body, or things in the room?"

"Mr. Sprague touched her hair, and—and lifted one of her hands," Penny contributed, quietly. "But you know how it must have been! We can't any of us tell EXACTLY every move we made, but there was some rushing about. The men, mostly, looking for—for whoever did it."

"Mrs. Marshall, did you see anyone—ANYONE AT ALL—in or near that room when you entered it?"

The white-faced young wife lifted her head and looked at him dazedly. "There wasn't anyone in—in that room, I know," she faltered. "It felt horrible—being in there with—with her—all alone—"

"But near the room? In the main hall or in the little foyer where the telephone is?" Dundee persisted.

"I—don't think so... I can't—remember—seeing ANYONE... Oh, Hugo!" and again she crouched against her husband, who soothed her with trembling hands that looked incongruously old against her childish fair hair and face.

"Where were the rest of you—EXACTLY where, I mean?" Dundee demanded, conscious that Captain Strawn had entered the room and was standing slightly behind him.

"There was such a babel of answers, given and then hastily cor-will you tell the story, beginning with the moment I left you and Mrs. Dunlap and Mrs. Selim today?" (To Be Continued)

Story of Man To Be Traced At Chicago Fair

CHICAGO.—The mounds, ruins, temples, religious symbols and other traces of cultural attainment which the archaeologist and anthropologist read the story of the progress of human culture.

While the Chicago World's Fair in 1933 will have as its central theme the conquests of A Century of Progress made possible by scientific achievements in transportation, the telephone and radio, lighting, machine of production, medicine and education back of all this is the story of Man himself. This is the theme of the anthropological exhibit.

Twelve acres have been reserved for the story of man's culture on American soil.

Regional Differences

Social organization, ceremonial life and artistic ideas show the same regional differences, and if man's body is studied it becomes apparent that physical type like wise shows variations, according to Dr. Fay-Cooper Cole professor of anthropology at the University of Chicago.

When the American Indian cultures are plotted on the map they fall into nine distinct culture areas north of Mexico. These range from the primitive hunting groups to settled agriculturists.

In connection with these groupings the Anthropological Exposition is designed to answer questions concerning the relation of culture to environment, the effect of trade, warfare, inter-marriage and migrations on institutions and physical types.

In the allotted space the separate groups will be arranged in geographical relation to one another, and with native Indians and Eskimo present to depict their daily life and tribal customs. These groups include besides the Eskimo, the California Indians of the Northwest coast, the Blackfoot hunters of the great plains, the pueblo builders and the nomadic Navajo expert horsemen and sheep herders.

Moody said commenting on a request from Governor Reed of Kansas that he join with other governors in asking railroads to "lay off" Mexican employees and hire home labor.

"The transient Mexican labor in Texas is principally that used in cotton picking and similar emergency work," said Governor Moody. "We have a large number of resident people of Mexican descent, but the transient Mexican labor I am informed has generally returned to Mexico."

The unemployment situation in Texas is far less pressing than in other parts of the country, Governor Moody added, and conditions
