Britain Views Murder As A Serious Crime

It wasn't especially pleasant to read about the hanging of that English woman who poisoned an aged cripple to win an inheritance. But the story had overtones, just the same, on which we in America could dwell with some

For if there ever was a case designed to show how British justice manages to get along without all the lather of sentimentality and soft-headedness which afflict the American variety, this was it.

Consider the facts briefly. Mrs. Dorothea Waddingham, trained nurse and mother of five children, fed poison to a patient who had made a will bequeathing to Mrs. Waddingham a considerable sum of money.

There evidently was no doubt as to her guilt; however, there was a man in the case—the father of two of Mrs. Waddingham's children-who was tried with her and

Because Mrs. Waddingham had five children, because it may have seemed that she was not solely responsible for the crime, and because the execution of a woman is never a matter which ordinary folk can contemplete calmly, the jury that convicted her added a strong recommendation

The trial judge indorsed it. The public signed numerous petitions to the same effect.

But all this made no difference. These appeals went to the convicted British criminal's last resort, the home secretary-in this case, Sir John Simon-and he refused to intervene. Despite her five children, despite public sympathy, despite the attitude of judge and jury, Mrs. Waddingham was duly hanged in the manner prescribed by law.

The British, you see, have an old-fashioned notion that murder is a serious crime. They feel especially bitter about poisoners. Poison is so easy to administer, so hard to detect; the British seem to feel that, unless poisoners are given the heaviest penalties the law allows, without exception, their tribe will increase beyond all endurance.

So Mrs. Waddingham was hanged, in spite of everything. And the next time some English nurse feels moved to slip a little rat-killer into a wealthy patient's soup, it is quite likely that Mrs. Waddingham's experience will rise before her mind's eye and cause her to pause.

All this is worth going into at this length because, in America, we never seem able to adopt that eminently sensible viewpoint. Our sentiment always goes out to the killer, not to his victim.

If we had had Mrs. Waddingham over here, we would have had innumerable appeals stays, reprieves, and pleas for clemency. In the end, the lady might have spent as many as five years behind the bars; and her case would have been no deterrent at all to other potential poisoners.

The contrast is too striking to overlook. British law may at times be heartless and cold, but it is strictly logical. And-which is very much to the point-it does put the fear of God into murderers.

REMEMBERING

Great-Aunt Clemmie was brought up to the Spartan life. She enjoyed (she always said) getting up at five on a Saturday morning, hanging her market basket over her arm, and going down town to do the marketing for the week-end. She said, "If you get there first-you'll get the best!"

Aunt Clemmie is a fine reminder of her time. Nowadays one needn't rise with the birds to be sure of a full market basket. It's so much simpler and more efficient to spend a few minutes with the advertisements. Marshalled before you, in your newspaper, is all the news that is necessary for your good living. There, in the advertisements, are facts—sound, solid facts—about prices and quality. Advertised, trade-marked merchandise must be honest merchandise. Or it wouldn't be advertised.
