couple of blackbirds that make hawks look like doves.

The blackbirds, a male and emale of the red-winged variety, jealously guard a nest near a bridge on the campus. Dozens of students and teachers have felt the sting of their beaks the past two weeks.

Anyone who tries to cross the bridge is a likely target. The birds batter him, usually on the head, with their beaks and "It's not common for these birds to do this," said Prof. Joseph J. Hickey of he UW wildlike ecology department. "And for two birds to do it is absolutely incredible. Either they have young in the nest or the young have left the next and are nearby.'

Hickey, who said he has robed many a nest without many repercussions, said that only once did a bird draw blood from him-a hawk.

"Even a hawk will just swoop at you, but hardly ever hit you with the beak," he said. Hickey predicted the feathered fury would run its course soon because "the young usually only nest for two weeks."

However, one victim of the blackbird power hinted at "If they get any wilder we will start having to think about blackbird pie," he said. CUT IMPORTS
