SERIAL STORY

WORKING WIVES

BY LOUISE HOLMES
COPYRIGHT, 1939, NEA SERVICE, INC.

CHAPTER I

"YOUR toast is getting cold, Marian."

"It'll be a few more minutes."

"Okay, I'll eat it and make some more for you." It was the agreeable voice of her husband, waiting into the bedroom on the pungent odor of freshly made coffee.

Dan Harkness was always agreeable. Sometimes Marian was aggravated by his exceeding good nature. Sometimes she longed to release her vast load of uneasiness and discontent through the channels of a lusty quarrel.

She stood before the mirror, carefully pulling a black felt hat over the deep waves of her hair. The hat had come from Manning's French Room, it was the last word in exclusive smartness. She folded the crisp veil back over the close-fitting brim. Slowly she turned, critical eyes on her wide-shouldered, slim-hipped reflection. Her black dress, deceptively simple, a creation of imported material and clever designing, seemed to have been molded to her slender figure.

Turning, a perpendicular line etched itself between her silken smooth brows. She definitely did not look 32, but still—

Thirty-two. She hated it, cringed away from it, had acquired the perpendicular line in a vain effort to avoid it. But 32 was young; authorities on feminine allure agreed that a woman's most attractive years were her 30s. Possibly, in the social world, but not in a business office. In a business office a woman of 32 was beginning to be outdated. It was more difficult to hold her place than it had been to obtain it.

The little line bit deeper into her forehead and she rubbed it with a tapering forefinger. Dan mustn't know that she was vaguely worried about her job. She had, for 10 years, been a little smug over her success, not exactly throwing it up to Dan, just being a bit superior.

She gathered up her gloves and fox cape, slipping once more to gain reassurance from the mirror. No woman in a cage this day would be more perfectly groomed or more carefully smoothed. Her skin was flawlessly smooth, her body youthfully supple.

What was wrong then? There was a discouraging lack about her appearance. The fire was gone, eagerness and joy were gone. Had ferocity of purpose and deadly efficiency in the business world robbed her of feminine charm?

CLANGING around the cluttered bedroom, she frowned. Miserable cubbyhole of a room. For long she had considered moving into a larger apartment. But moving was expensive, larger apartments were expensive, everything she wanted was expensive. It wasn't fair, just because she had married an unsuccessful man, that she should be denied all of the world's riches.

Going to the painted table at the end of the tiny kitchen, she sat down. Dan, careless, big and broad and easy, filled her cup with coffee.

"The rent is due today, Dan. The rent is due today. Here is my part."

Dan glared at her, as he took the money. He said nothing. That was the way it had been. Marian paying part of the rent, part of the grocery bill, part of everything.

Dan sat down, buried his face in the morning paper.

"I bought sheets and towels this month. Your share is $5.90." This was something in the manner of a gouge, a way of getting a few more dollars for the ever-increasing Manning bill. Odd, with her excellent salary, that she should never have enough. Of course, the private secretary to Grand Fellows, Investment Broker and "The rent is due today, Dan," Marian said. "Here is my share." Dan glared at her as he took the money. He said nothing.

Consultant, had a certain position to maintain. Marian tried not to think that a woman of 32 was obliged to wage a never-ending battle against the fresh young girls who filled the offices. Dan laid $6 beside her plate. Dan was generous. Why could he not earn more money with which to be generous? Again Marian wondered what freak of fate had kept Dan a salesman, with a drawing account of $35 a week, after 12 years of endeavor. For Dan did try, she knew it. That is, once he had been ambitious. He seldom mentioned his work now.

He pushed the paper aside, saying, "I saw Pete Thorpe yesterday. He's just back from his honeymoon."

Marian looked up, surprised. "I didn't know that he and Carma were married."

"What? But they've been engaged for 10 years. This was to have been her last buying trip."

"Every trip for the last five years was to have been her last. I take it that Pete got tired of waiting."

"But he wasn't making enough to support them—"

"Perhaps not in the way Carma wanted to be supported. His wife, she's a cute little trick named Julie, seems perfectly satisfied."

Cute little trick—Marian resented the description. The world was full of cute little tricks and each one was a menace. "Pete and Carma were terribly in love," she mused. "I can't understand—"

"Love is very apt to die unless it has a little encouragement," Dan said. Because of something in his tone, Marian snapped, "It certainly dies without a little financial encouragement. You men seem to forget that."

He returned lightly, "Let it die. Who cares?"

RESENTFULLY, Marian finished her breakfast. In a way it was just as well that Carma had not married Pete. She was a buyer for Manning's and made twice Pete's salary, she was accustomed to niceties which he could never be able to provide and he there are French signal stations at the border waiting to flash warnings direct to Paris.

"Not far from Paris, before they had to requisition most vehicles for this new war, you could take a ride out to Belleau Wood and see part the late war. German cannon still stand crazily with their muzzles lifted toward Paris. The Americans captured them and left them there. Rusty machine-guns clutter the ground. Trenches zig-zag through the woods. Piles of shrapnel are stacked neatly. The French, with pride say, the Germans will never get that close to Paris again."

"No," she said wearily. "It's too late now."

First Night Of War Sleepless For Parisians

PARIS, Sept. 5 (AP)—The first night of war was a sleepless one for thousands of Parisians who feared German bombers would strike at once at the capital, John Martin of the Associated Press Paris staff said today in a broadcast.

"I could not sleep, nor could a great many others, I found out later," Martin said. "Everybody was waiting, waiting for the German air force to strike at Paris, to lay its tons of explosive eggs on this city."

"One has the windows closed, the curtains light, or black paper pasted over the panes. You think you hear a sound, you switch off the lights, open the window and lean out. Nothing—nothing at all."

"You go back in your shell, close the window, turn on the radio. Out it comes, propaganda pitched in all keys—German, French, English, Italian. Off go the lights, back to the window. A bright moon with a few clouds makes you mutter, 'A perfect night for bombing.'"

"The streets are deserted. A policeman in a steel helmet and all-stands in a narrow pool of light shed from the precautionary lights with which Paris is now equipped. He is all ears and all eyes."

"Tonight and the next night will be like that, or worse. They say that the first one you think something it is just the waiting that gets you even though you know
