In 1983, A Nation at Risk started the education reform movement of the 1980s. At all levels of government, political leaders jumped on the reform bandwagon.

The attention generated for public education has been, for the most part, useful. From this exposure, sweeping changes have been implemented. These include increased high school graduation requirements, increased course offerings, revised funding, restructuring of the profession, state mandated curriculum, instructional methodologies, and student achievement being tested and compared.

Many of the reforms and recommendations will never be implemented. Some are too costly, others too drastic, and a few too impractical to consider. They all, however, provide a most important service. They force us to look critically at ourselves as a community, state, and nation.

The reports, laws, and recommendation affect each of us in a different way. They make us argumentative, reflective, demonstrative, or defensive. This simple act of thought and reaction is more important than anything else. For when education is featured in the news, observed, described, researched, discussed, and debated, it gains in importance. When education is relegated to the back pages of the newspaper and becomes a community's forgotten stepchild, then we really have cause for concern.

Pat Milstead Wynn
Class of 1972

Our featured ex-student this week, is Pat Milstead Wynn, a 1972 graduate of Plains High School. Pat, her husband Kevin, and their two daughters, Heather, 13 years old and Amy, nine, live in Follette, Texas. She is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Alvis Milstead of Plains.

After graduating from Plains schools, Pat attended Panhandle State University where she received a Bachelor of Science Degree in Home Economics Education. She is very active in community, school and church activities and enjoys her role of mother, housewife, and teacher. After recently undergoing chemotherapy, Pat has just received the wonderful news that there are no positive signs of cancer in her system. We are all very, very happy for Pat and her family.

National Ag Day To Be Observed

National Agriculture Day, set to honor the nation's food and fiber providers, will be observed March 20.

According to Kirk Lewis, county agent with the Texas Agricultural Extension Service, business and consumer groups will join in honoring farmers and ranchers on that special day.

County, state and national observances of Agriculture Day will be keyed to the continuing theme of "Honoring America's Providers."

Coordinated nationally by the Agriculture Council of America in Washington, D.C., the Agriculture Day observance is a part of National Agriculture Week, March 19-25.

"National Agriculture Day and Week observances can reflect the ideas and wishes of every community and county," said Lewis.

The two observances provide special recognition of the food and fiber industry's contributions to America, the agent said.

Lewis said the celebrations can increase awareness of agriculture's accomplishments and the challenges it faces in meeting the world's food and fiber needs.
