THE STORY: Pete Morrison, a scout, and Nate Wilkinson, have left the wagon train which Nate Wilkinson is leading to California. To find Betty, Nate's daughter, kidnapped years before. Both men think she may be the girl that Zad Barnes, a renegade at Two Rivers, calls his daughter. Pete remains at a ranch where Pete first saw the girl, while Nate rides on to Two Rivers to find her present whereabouts.

TWO Rivers looked the same as when Pete Morrison saw it the first time. The gambling game was going on in the shade of the store. The same white men and the same Indians, even Tobey, were leading about.

Pete went into the store and found Barnes behind the counter. "Well," Zad said, "you're back in a hurry. Didn't you find your wagon train?"

"Yes, I met it. They're on the way, but traveling slow."
"You didn't."
"I always like to make time. I came by High Valley. Had dinner there."

"You seem to like that place?"
"I do. I suppose I can quarter here till my friends arrive?"
"I reckon so. The same room you had is empty. Sally will get anything you want."

"Thanks."
Pete couldn't afford to be too eager about seeing Betty. He pretended to be extra solicitous about his horse, and killed time taking care of him before going to his room. The Indian gambling game of "hand" was still going on around the bunkies, but he had an idea it was all a sham. He had the feeling that he was being watched by every eye at the trading post.

And somewhere about the place, although invisible, was Gabe Cox, the man whose jaw he had broken. Cox wasn't the kind to forgive an injury like that, although he might be restrained by Zad Barnes.

Pete went around to the room he had occupied, and found it locked. He went back to the dining room, walked through it and into the kitchen; his heart pounding. If Betty was at Two Rivers this was where she should be. He found only the fat squaw who did the cooking.

"My room," he said. "Locked. Zad tell me to find Sally."
She called out in a dialect that seemed to be a mixture of Ute and Shoshoni, of which Pete knew enough to make out what she said, although not what seemed to be Sally's Indian name.

"You come out. White man want to go to bed."
An inner door opened and Sally came out giggling. She had a bunch of keys in her hand, and she led the way across the court to Pete's room, still giggling.

She went inside, and Pete handed her a silver dollar. "I want to see white girl, Betty. You send her here."
"She not here."
"Not here? Jess Williams told me she was here."
"She go away with Gabe Cox, maybe to marry."

PETE'S heart felt like a chunk of lead. He was sure Betty would never marry Cox willingly, or go away with him. It could mean only that Barnes had smelled a mouse, and hidden the girl away somewhere, and he didn't know what step to take.

He sent Sally for a tub and hot water, and after carefully locking the door tried to think things out while he took a bath. If the girl was really gone he would have to go back and tell Nate Wilkinson, and he would have to go away in the night. He had no illusions about his danger.

After he had bathed and dressed, the room was full of steam. He moved over to the blanketed window to raise it a little and saw the Indian boy Walter crossing the court with the air of pride he had noticed about him before. Walter was a Shoshoni, a superior type to the Indians whom Zad

Barnes boasted he held by the wrist. He wondered how Walter happened to be here, and guessed the answer. While he and Nate had been washing the dishes Jess Williams had probably sent the boy on ahead to tell Zad Barnes of their arrival.

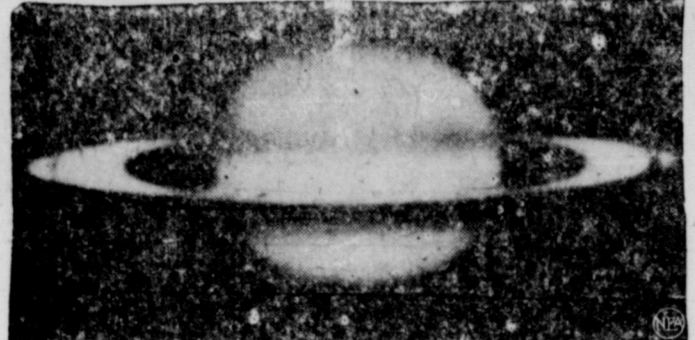

He stepped to the door and called out no louder than necessary. "Walter, come here a minute, will you?"
The boy hesitated a moment, then entered the room. He met Pete's eyes defiantly, and without fear.

Pete said, "Sit down, Walter. You like Betty a lot, don't you?"
The boy's eyes flashed, but he said nothing and remained standing.

Pete hesitated a moment before taking what might be the greatest gamble of his life. He had seen this boy only once before in his life, and he had been unfriendly then, as he was now. But there had been something in his eyes as he looked at Betty that made Pete think he worshipped the girl. But whether that would be enough to outbalance his loyalty to Zad, and whether Pete could convince him that he would be serving Betty's interests best by going against Zad was the all-important question, and the gamble.

PETE asked softly, "Did you ever know, Walter, that Betty is not Zad Barnes' daughter, and that he stole her from her own father when she was little?"
Still Walter said nothing. Pete couldn't even be sure that he was even understood. In dialect Pete asked, "Do you speak Shoshoni?"
The boy's eyes widened, but he said, "I speak English better."

"Good. Betty's real father is at High Valley now. He wants to find her and give her a real home. He is a fine man, and he will be good to her."
Pete knew that if Walter went out of there then and told what he had heard it could cost both Pete and Nate their lives. Yet he believed that Zad Barnes already knew everything he was telling Walter. (To Be Continued)
