

Bull Town Bulletins

By Bill Ellis

LAST WEEK we discussed the state's prison system, in relation to the types of people who make up the system.

It is well known by most Texas residents that our prisons are full to overflowing. In fact, it has come to the point that prison officials have been obligated in recent months and years to give certain prisoners early releases so as to have room for newly-sentenced prisoners.

The prison dilemma was one of the problems addressed by the Texas Legislature in their recently-concluded session, and unfortunately, one of the matters that was not resolved by the lawmakers.

On a recent Friday, the prison system released some 225 inmates, whom the officials deemed suitable for early release, mainly so they could admit another 225 prisoners the following Monday.

The question in Ye Editor's mind is: Do the 225 prisoners being admitted this week pose any more of a threat to society than those released to make room for the new crop?

They say that necessity is the mother of invention, and prison officials have come up with a new device that they bestow on certain low-risk inmates who are given early release.

These prisoners are fitted with special anklets, which contain electronic devices which allow the authorities to find them if they are not at home, where they are supposed to be. These low-risk prisoners are released to their homes until such times as their sentences have expired.

The anklets cannot be removed (at least that's what they say), and prisoners would find themselves in a worse set of circumstances if they were to find a way to remove the devices.

Since it costs taxpayers roughly $12,000 per year for each person in our prison system, the "anklet" system effects a nice saving, since these prisoners can be maintained for $9.00 to $11.00 per day, or around $4,000 per year.

The overcrowding problem is one that has affected not only the state prisons, but also certain city and county jails, such as Amarillo's.

Parmer County's adequate jail has been able to host several prisoners who were "farmed out" to the county by larger cities with cramped facilities. The county has been able to receive reimbursement for providing for prisoners in this manner.

It may be recalled by those who attended the meetings a few years ago on stimulating the local economy that one of the ideas brought out was to attempt to get a new prison built in the local area. While some folks might not want to have a prison in their backyard, it's sort of like some potential industries which have drawbacks--and some communities will make a big effort along this line.

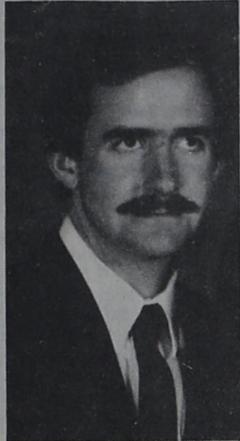

There are those who say that the solution to the prison problem lies in the establishment of privately-owned and operated prison institutions. The private sector, many people argue, could come up with a way to cope with the problem, take it off the state's hands, and turn the prison system into a profit-making venture.

This may be possible, but it definitely would present one of the biggest challenges the private sector ever had.

At any rate, our prison system remains a problem, and one that is likely to be with us for awhile. Like so many of our present problems, this one has not developed overnight. Likewise, it's going to take some time to resolve.
