Scattered Shots

By the Editor

The current folder from the National Board of Fire Underwriters recalls the tragic fire at Babbs Switch, Okla., on Christmas Eve of 1924, in which 36 persons were killed and 40 injured. I can remember this fire quite well, but where my memory bogs down is on the exact location of Babbs Switch. Is this the same place as the Babbs which is located south of Hobart? Will some reader who does remember, please inform me?

Speaking of fires, everyone has heard of the Chicago fire, but how many know that there was a much worse fire the same day, Oct. 9, 1871, as far as human life is concerned. In the Chicago fire 250 persons were killed, but a forest fire at Peshtigo, Wis., on the same day killed 1,152. Perhaps this is merely a question of publicity, just as many people think that Pike's Peak is the highest in Colorado because it is so well known. Actually, there are about 27 peaks in Colorado higher than Pike's Peak.

Another example of this is the fact that the Texas City explosion killed more people than the San Francisco earthquake and fire.

Texas has the unhappy distinction of having been the location of our greatest natural disaster, the Galveston flood, of course which killed 6,000. The Johnstown flood killed 2,209. The Florida hurricane of 1928 killed 1,180.

All these, of course, are far overshadowed by our steady, day-by-day highway toll, which does not attract so much attention because it is not so spectacular, but which actually kills far more Americans than natural disasters. Fires of course are not natural disasters, but, like wrecks, are the product of human carelessness.

Mrs. Adamson Writes

Hazel Green, Mo.
Nov. 12, 1957

Dear Editor and Friends:

Here is your old gad-about friend, Jessie Adamson, writing a few lines from the Ozarks.

From Fort Smith, Arkansas, I came through the Boston Range of the Ozarks. To be sure, we westerners know that the Ozarks are not even a third cousin to the mountains of New Mexico, Colorado and Wyoming. But just the same, folks, "Thars beauty in them thar hills." There is breathtaking, marvelous beauty.

On leaving Fort Smith we are at once enthralled by the swiftly unfolding panorama of autumn colors. The hills, valleys, and along the streams are thickly wooded with trees of several varieties, elm white oak, post oak, cottonwood, willow and blackjack, with a scattering of cedar and pine. All these combine into beautiful autumn colors. The somber brown of the blackjacks makes the background for the ever changing scene of 'golden leaves and red' of the rust and dark green. These lovely colors in ever changing patterns create a feast for the eyes never to be forgotten.

In this region are many beautiful homes, and one of the best loved aspects to me were the tall chimneys of wood burning fireplaces. On this particular frosty morning the sight of smoke curling out from these chimneys brought a sensation of warmth and cheer to the heart of a traveler from West Texas where the trend of progress has eliminated long ago the comfort and romance of wood burning fireplaces.

We had a rest stop at Fayetteville. It is a lovely town. But I'm afraid I'll remember it as a place where the coffee shop in the bus station was closed on Sunday morning. It was nine o'clock and I had not been to breakfast. So you know me, I was hungry and tired from traveling, and as we left that lovely town in the Ozarks I was rather peeved that the cafe people failed to realize that folks away from home get hungry on Sunday, the same as any other day.

Mrs. S. G. Adamson
