CJC A Part Of Expanding Program

Post-high-school education can take many forms. Parents usually hope that their children will be able to go on to a four-year college, but, for a variety of reasons, this often is not possible. Now the phenomenal growth of the two-year or junior college is providing an excellent way for hundreds of thousands of students to receive advanced training that might otherwise elude them. Almost one million students are enrolled in more than 700 junior colleges—and these numbers, both students and schools, are rapidly increasing each year.

The two-year college is filling two main educational needs: It offers a wide variety of job-training programs for those desiring pre-professional or vocational careers; and it provides two years of college-level work for students who then can transfer to four-year schools as fully-accredited juniors. Junior colleges are also playing an increasing role in adult education. Many adults who are trying to upgrade themselves in their jobs or who simply want further education for personal enrichment have found junior colleges well equipped to help them.

As such a two year college, Clarendon Junior College has obvious appeal for both students and their families. The college is within easy commuting distance for many students. Thus room and board charges are eliminated. Entrance fees are much less expensive than those of four year colleges in the area. The instruction offered is comparable to that in the first two years of most four year colleges or universities. High school graduates and their parents should carefully examine goals and abilities before considering specific forms of higher education. Educators say that junior colleges are the solutions for those students: who cannot afford college away from home; who are not yet ready to leave home, although prepared for college; who have college level ability, but must make up entrance requirements; who want to prepare for a vocational or pre-professional career; who want no more than two years of general education.

In view of the tremendous demands being made upon colleges
