TRoubles of Old Firemen.

Primitive Fire Fighting and the Many Complications Attending It.

In the days of the old volunteer fire department in New York matters were not regulated and ordered as they are today, but nearly everything depended upon the judgment and foresight of the individual, and there was practically no public authority to enforce compliance with even the most reasonable regulations.

A quite large item of domestic importation during the years preceding the civil war was cotton, chiefly from New Orleans, Mobile, Savannah and Charleston. This cotton was stored in cotton warehouses, and when a fire occurred in one of these it lasted for several hours, but seldom did such a conflagration in the first year of the century at the corner of Roosevelt and Front streets lasted three days, at the end of which the walls stood intact. Some years later, in another fire in a cotton warehouse, it was thought necessary to blow up an adjacent building in order to prevent the flames from spreading, as the water had frozen and there was a high wind blowing. The owner of the premises refused to give up the keys, and as the firemen had no right to demand them an interview was arranged with the mayor to talk the matter over. The mayor recommended that the keys should be demanded "in the name of the city." The owner continued to refuse, until finally the police were called. Then he gave up the keys.

Another cotton warehouse fire occurred in New street. When it was supposed that there would be no further conflagration, the firemen were told that they might better go home. They went home, leaving one company only on the spot playing on the cotton until daybreak. As the cotton continued to smolder the proposition was made that time might be saved by the adoption of a new plan of fire fighting, and so the originator of it, Zophar Mills, "went down to the wharf and hired some laborers at 50 cents an hour." They commenced throwing the cotton out of the windows into the street and pumping water on it through hose, thus, as Mr. Mills described the method, "bringing the water in contact with every particle of fire."

The kindly deeds of great public benefactors are seldom appreciated by their contemporaries. The next day Mr. Mills sought out the insurance companies which had policies on the cotton saved and presented his bill for the money paid the wharf laborers. It was about $15. Mr. Mills thought the companies would pay it promptly, as by his original method of cotton saving they had been saved several thousand dollars. The companies, however, refused to liquidate Mr. Mills' bill, and, as he asked in his memoirs, "it was with the greatest difficulty I got my money back, promising myself not to do the like again."

Under the organized rule of the present New York fire department the engagement of dock laborers to throw cotton out of windows at 50 cents an hour would be regarded as a somewhat primitive method of fire fighting, and the presentation by the foreman of a fire company of a bill to some insurance company would probably end as a penalty his removal from the force, and he, too, might promise himself "not to do the like again."—New York Sun.

The Impossible.

She was angry, not to say disgusted. "That's the third time this month," she said, "that I have read a story about a woman going through her husband's pockets for change."

"Well, my dear," he returned apologetically, "you mustn't blame me. I didn't know it." "Of course," she exclaimed. "You know better. It's preposterous, outrageous, that such libels should be allowed to circulate in the guise of humor. It would be just as truthful to talk about a man going through his wife's pockets. Why don't they ever do that?"

He shook his head. "I can't say positively," he said, "but it is just possible that some humorist once tried to find one and knows how it is. One may joke about the improbable, you know, when he feels that he ought to draw the line at the impossible."—Chicago Post.

Pedagogue.

Exception is often taken to the use of the word pedagogue instead of schoolmaster when a teacher is to be mentioned. What if one called the place where teaching is done a pedagogue? It would sound odd enough now, but the word was formerly used in that sense. Thus an English writer of the last century, in describing his journey to the east, said, "Another part (of the university) is what they call the pedagogue, which is for noblemen and gentlemen. There are six youths in each room, with a master over them."—Youth's Companion.

THE GENUINE IRISH STEW.

How to Make It Out of Food Sometimes Thrown Away.

We are not apt to regard the Irish peasantry as either thrifty or a pattern in any matters of cookery, yet the canny Scotch are no more severe economists than the Irish of the northern country. The genuine Irish stew is a dish that deserves every praise. It is as great a success in its way as a Scotch broth of mutton, and it is a culinary lesson in the use of what people generally throw away.

To make this dish the peasant secures what scraps of meat and bones he can get for a few cents. The purchase is chiefly bone, and the meat is either beef or mutton, or it may be both. The bone and meat are separated and the fat is removed. The best way to make the broth is to throw the meat in one kettle and the bones in another and cover them both with cold water.

After the contents of the two kettles have simmered very slowly for an hour salt is added. The cook now gathers any sound vegetable tops—the green tops of celery, the green leaves outside the cabbage, which in less thrifty parts of the land are the requisite of the pig. These are chopped together and added to the kettle containing the bones and simmered with them for the next hour. For every two quarts of the stew two small onions cut in slices are added. When they have simmered half an hour, six small potatoes, cut in quarters, are put in.

When the potatoes have cooked half an hour, strain the broth off the bones and chopped vegetables, pressing the vegetables hard to extract all the pulp and flavor from them. Thicken the strained broth with a heaping tablespoonful of flour mixed with a large tablespoonful of butter. If mutton is used, the broth must be carefully skimmed before adding the thickening. Let the thickening cook in the strained broth for ten minutes, stirring it carefully; then pour it in the kettle of meat, onions and potatoes. Let the stew simmer a moment or two, stirring it constantly. Taste it to see if it needs more salt, add pepper and serve at once.

It is largely a pot of luck, depending upon the vegetables at hand and the amount of meat it contains, but it is nutritious, even when it is made largely of vegetables, and it is always excellent.—New York Tribune.

An Armenian Bridegroom.

Notwithstanding the Turk, the Armenians still marry, and a writer in Chambers' Journal explains the get up of the groom:

A brawny barber, his arms bare to the elbow, bustles in. His assistant carries a chair, over which is spread a flowered towel. Then enters a procession. The bridegroom, his countenance of ashen pallor (it has been floured for the occasion), totters along, supported by sympathizing friends.

After he is shaved by the barber a variety of costly and wonderful garments are put upon him, all of them gifts from his fair Gemira. Fourteen of the bridegroom's brothers, each holding a candle in the right hand, strip him to the skin and then reclothe him.—new undergarments, three green silk waistcoats, a blue silk robe, sash, flowered white satin overcoat, two jackets over that, a long loose blue robe and a new fez. The stockings, however, do not fit and the bridegroom grumbles. Then he kisses my hands and sits down beside me on the divan.

"I suppose you're very happy?" I somewhat infelicitously ask, not knowing how to begin.

He smiles as if in pain. "You love your bride very much?" "Very much indeed."

"What's her name?" "Effendi, I forget."

An Unspeatable Sell.

A resident in Vevay, Switzerland, lately died and bequeathed a large property which he was supposed to possess to the "local hospital of the town."

There being two local medical charities—the town hospital and the Hospices de Samaritan—a lawsuit was entered by the former in order to decide its right to the legacy.

After considerable expense had been incurred the dispute was abruptly brought to a close by the discovery that the deceased had indulged in a most unseasonable jest, and, in fact, did not possess a penny to bequeath.—Pearson's Weekly.

Won't Be Fired.

Mrs. Wearie (who has a French maid)—This is the last time I'll have a servant girl who can't speak English.

Mr. Wearie—Why don't you send her off?

Mrs. Wearie—I've been trying for six weeks, but I can't make her understand what the word "discharge" means. She thinks it means a day off, and when I tell her she is discharged she goes out and has a good time.—Strand Magazine.
