Rupe tries to intimidate Herman and Verman, and the two litle colored boys speedily drive him off the place.

Verman struck from behind. He struck as hard as he could. And he struck with the tines down. For, in his simple, direct African way he wished to kill his enemy, and he wished to kill him as soon as possible. That was his single, earnest purpose.

On this account, Rupe Collins was peculiarly unfortunate. He was plucky and he enjoyed conflict, but neither his ambitions nor his anticipations had ever included murder. He had not learned that an habitually aggressive person runs the danger of colliding with beings in one of those lower stages of evolution wherein theories not yet made their appearance. The rake glanced from the back of Rupe's head to his shoulder, but it felled him. Both darkies jumped full upon him instantly, and the three rolled and twisted upon the stable floor, unloosing upon the air sincere maledictions close ly connected with complaints of cruel and unusual treatment, while certain expressions of feeling presently emanating from Herman and Verman indicated that Rupe Collins, in this extremity, was proving bimself not too slavishly addicted to fighting by rule. Dan and Duke, mistaking all for mirth.

From the panting, pounding, yelling heap issued words and phrases hitherto quite unknown to Penrod and Sam; also a hourse repetition in the voice of Rupe concerning his ear left it not to be doubted that additional mayhem was taking place. Appalled, the two spectators retreated to the doorway nearest the yard, where they stood dumbly watching the cataciysm. The struggle increased in primitive simplicity. Time and again the howling Rupe got to his knees, only to go down again as the earnest brothers in their own way assisted him to a more reclining position. usngured and maniacai. With a wild eye he looked about him for his trusty rake, but Penrod in horror had long since thrown the rake out into the yard. Naturally it had not seemed necessary to remove the lawn mower. The frantic eye of Verman fell upon the lawn mower, and instantly he leaped to its handle. Shrilling a wordless warery, he charged, propelling the whirling, deafening knives straight upon the prone legs of Rupe Collins. The lawn mower was sincerely intended to pass longitudinally over the body of Mr. Collins from heel to head, and it was the time for a death song. Black Valkyrie hovered in the shrieking air.

"Cut his gizzud out!" shricked Herman, urging on the whirling knives. They touched and lacerated the shin of Rupe, as, with the supreme agony of effort a creature in mortal peril puts forth before succumbing, he ore himself free of Herman and got pon his feet.

Herman was up as quickly. He eaped to the wall and seized the garlen scythe that hung there.

"I'm go' cut you' gizzud out," he an ounced definitely, "an' eat it!"

"Well," said Sam at last, "I guess it's time I better be gettin' home. So long. Penrod."

"So long, Sam." said Penrod feebly. With solemn gaze he watched his friend out of sight. Then he went glowly into the house and after an interval occupied in a unique manner appeared in the library holding a pair of brilliantly gleaming shoes in his hand. Mr. Schofield, reading the evening paper, glanced frowningly over it at his offspring.

"Look, papa," said Penrod; "I found your shoes where you'd taken 'em off in your room to put on your slippers, and they were all dusty. So I took 'em out on the back porch and gave 'em a good blacking. They shine up fine, don't they ?'

"Well, I'll be a d-dud-dummed!" said the startled Mr. Schofield. Penrod was zigzagging back to no outside the little Burber shop next to the corner drug store, and Penrod, undergoing a tollet preliminary to his very slowly approaching twelfth birthday, was adhesive enough to retain upon his face much hair as it fell from the shears. There is a mystery here. The tonsorial processes are not unagreeable to manhood-in truth, they are soothingbut the hairs detached from a boy's head get into his eyes, his ears, his nose, his mouth and down his neck, and he does everywhere itch excrutiatingly. Wherefore he blinks, winks, weeps, twitches, condenses his countenance and squirms, and perchance the barber's seissors clip more than intended-belike an outlying flange of ear.

"Um-muh-ow!" said Penrod, this thing having happened. "D' I touch y' up a little?" inquired the barbar, smiling falsely, "Ooh-uh!" The boy in the chair offered inarticulate protest, as the wound was rubbed with alum.

"That don't burt," said the barber. "You will get it, though, if you don't sit stiller." he continued, nipping in the bud any attempt on the part of his pa tient to think that he already had "it.

"Pfuff," said Penrod, meaning no disrespect, but endeavoring to disledge "You ought to see how still that litwas already in a badly dismantled the Georgie Bassett sits," the barber went on reprovingly. "I hear everybody says he's the best boy in town. "Pfuff! Phirr!" There was a touch of intentional contempt in this.

"I haven't heard nobody around the statement about what he intended to added the barber, "about nobody of the name of Penrod Schofield." "Well," said Penrod, clearing his mouth after a struggle, "who wants 'em to? Ouch!" "I hear they call Georgie Bassett the

"What?" demanded Penrod. "You'd sick that pore ole dog of yours on her cat if she had one, I expect," guessed the barber derisively.

"He'd be lucky," said Penrod, with a sinister frown "if he got home alive."

"Suppose it was a boy twice your size? "Just let him try," said Penrod ominously. "You just let him try. He'd never see daylight again; that's all!" The barber dug ten active fingers into the helpless scalp before him and did his best to displace it, while the anguished Penrod, becoming instantly a seething crucible of emotion, misdirected his natural resentment into maddened brooding upon what he would do to a boy "twice his size" who should dare to call him "little gentleman." The barber shook him as his father had never shaken him; the barber buffeted him, rocked him frantically to and fro; the barber seemed to be trying to wring his neck, and Penrod saw himself in staggering zigzag pictures, destroying large, screaming, fragmentary boys who had insulted him.

The torture stopped suddenly, and clinched, weeping eyes began to see again, while the barber applied cooling lotions which made Penrod smell like a colored housemaid's ideal. "Now what," asked the barber, combing the reeking locks gently, "what would it make you so mad fer to have somebody call you a little gentleman? It's a kind of compliment, as it were, you might say. What would you want to hit anybody fer that fer?" To the mind of Penrod this question was without meaning or reasonableness. It was within neither his power nor his desire to analyze the process by which the phrase had become offensive to him and was now rapidly assuming the proportions of an outrage. He knew only that his gorge rose at the thought of it. "You just let 'em try it!" he said threateningly as he slid down from the chair. And as he went out of the door, after further conversation on the same subject, he called back those warning words once more: "Just let 'em try it-just once! That's all I ask

'em to! They'il find out what they The barber chuckled. Then a fly lit on the barber's nose, and he slapped at it, and the slap missed the fly, but did not miss the nose. The barber was irritated. At this moment his birdlike eye gleamed a gleam as it fell upon customers approaching-the prettiest little girl in the world, leading by the hand her baby brother, Mitchy-Mitch, coming to have Mitchy-Mitch's bair clipped against the heat.

It was a hot day and idle, with little to feed the mind, and the barber was a mischlevous man with an irritated nose. He did his worst.

Probably never since the tabernacle was built has it accommodated such a crowd as was gathered for the Kilties pertendance from near and from afar. Their program was all that could be desired, and the music rendered by the fifteen members of the band captivated the audience from the start. Special features of the program were introduced and secured hearty applause. Possibly first little Jamie Muir, whose Highland fling and Irish jig and winning smile quite carried away those present. James Pearse, Scotch tenor, soloist, also proved highly pleasing to his hearers, and his appearance was a signal for numerous encores. The Scottish bagpipe, while not one of the most musical instruments, at least made the record of being one of the most interesting to a majority of the audience, and its playing by Director Murdoch J. Macdonald was also appreciated.

The Kilties band was all that could have been desired, which is all the more to their credit, since it is easier to give an organization the name of possessing exceptional merit, than it is to live up to the reputation giv-

CHAUTAUQUA IN 1918 ASSURED

Thirty Brady Business Men Give Pledge for Next Year.

Brady's first chautauqua has met with popular and unqualified approval!

This fact was fully attested by the prompt and hearty response given by about thirty Brady business men to a call for signers to the guarantee pledg-

During the intermission in the one of the most inspiring of the whole chautauqua course, she explained the hopes and ambitions of the Ladies Tuesday club of Brady.

While the chautauqua just closed was presented under the auspices of the Brady Fire deager for Walker-Smith, was one business men gave a pledge of of the number responding to $750, yet the ladies of the Tuesthe chautauqua and to the activities of members this club is due, in a great measure, the success attained this year. Mrs. Henderson explained that while the 1917 chautauqua had been a success in that the receipts were sufficient to cover expenses, yet the surplus had been so small as to not warrant the fire boys making the venture for another year, However, believing the chautaugua offered a form of amusement that Brady and Mc-Culloch county needed and could heartify endorse, the Ladies two children, Mrs. A. N. King Tuesday club were desirous of again bringing the chautauqua to Brady. With the establishment of the chautauqua its possibilities for success were increased with each succeeding rear. Should next year's chautauqua, as well as those in succeeding years be the success for which they hoped, and a suffithereby placed in the treasury of the club, it was the purpose of the ladies to erect a beautiful and ornamental fountain on the public square as a gift to Brady and McCulloch county.

Mrs. Henderson's appeal brought instant response. Instead of the 15 men who were asked to pledge their support, there was such evident enthusiasm that a total of 30 names were appended to the guarantee and the Brady Y. M. B. L. also signified giving its influence and active support.

The fact that instead of one orbusiness men are now actively interested assures the maximum success for the 1918 chautauqua, since everyone will be a booster and active worker for such re-
