AAA News

By Jessie F. Brock

The next time you notice a gully cutting across a field, stop long enough to realize how far back that gully goes. It goes right back to the shelves of your grocery store. Not only is it eating away the top soil of a farm but it is taking cans of peas, corn and tomatoes from the shelves of your grocery store. It is taking beans and potatoes and flour from the bins and lamb and pork and beef from the meat counter. That gully is eating into your food supply. And the food supply of those who come

Too often we fail to realize the significance of such things as gullies cutting their ways across a field or muddy water on its way out to the ocean. People from town may notice the gully and the ugly way it cuts into the field but how many of them realize that it has anything to do with them. It may be recognized as erosion but erosion is a farmer's problem, they

Too few of us realize that that gully and thousands and thousands of other gullies are eating away the source of our food. Topsoil is the most valuable natural resource we have and gullies are wasting the resource. All of us depend on the soil and all of us should be concerned about the loss of that soil. Through the Agricultural Conservation Progarm the Nation cooperates with its farmers in the building of terraces, entour farming, the construction of dams and other practices which keep gullies from cutting across the land In this way the interest of each person in the country is being protected.

Then, too, it should be realized that a gully is a sign of advance breakdown of soil. There has been depletion and a breakdown of the soil structure in most cases before the gully started.
