Cultivation of Soil.

Caltivation is probably the most important feature connected with the handling of soils. Nature has placed soils, and it depends upon our skill use of and work this mine for the benefit of our crops. Cultivation is vital, and the subject is so wide that one scarcely knows where to begin. takes place and the soil is left in a but after an extended debate was de is liberated and a warm seed bed is fine, granulous condition. Plant food the seed. Every day's delay in getting in grain after the soil is dry enough to work means fewer bushels depth to plow, it seems to me that is & question which each farmer must decide for himself, according to his own soil, conditions and crop requirements. If the soil of a given field is deep, say ten or twelve inches, and spring grain, I would try to plow it about seven inches deep. But if by some mischance that field were not plowed until the spring I would plow the colder the surface turned up. If The enemey's loss was 700 killed, in- that field were plowed in the fall for cluding the former Sultan of Sokoto | mangels, I would try for about eight and a majority of the chiefs. The inches. But if the surface soil of this field is only six or seven inches deep, I would try to plow it only five or six inchest deep. In other words, the depth of the soil, the time of plowing and the nature of the crop grown are all factors in determining how deep to plow. I do not wish to bring any subsoil to the surface if I can avoid it. Sometimes, however, the surface soil is so shallow that some of the subsoil must necessarily be brought to the surface in plowing. If I have a deep soil I want to give the roots of the plants liberal feeding grounds, because they will, if allowed, strike down deeply. As to the question of frequency of plowing, it appears to me that that also depends upon soils and circumstances. Heavy, compact soils require more plowing than lighter ones. Such soils tend to get hard and bake and become inert, and hence require the plow to open them and improve their mechanical condition. Remembering, however, that faint heart never won fair lady, he seized her firstly in his strong arms and planted a nice one right on her rosebud mouth. "Mammal" yelled the girl. and the young man's hair went pom padour in a second and the cold sweat stood out on his brow like warts op a summer squash. "Mamma, where did you put them apples you said we could have to eat?" concluded the young lady. And while the directions for finding "them apples" came in muffled tones from up stairs, the young man was realizing how the doomed murderers feels when the messenger with the reprive dashes up to the scene at the very last moment. -Paris News.

When Mars Came Our Way. "In 1877 Mars was at his nearest to us; near, that is, from an astronomer's point of view, though really at the enormous distance of thirty-five million miles," says Mabel Loomis Todd, in the St. Nicholas. "Yet a great deal was learned about this neighbor in the sky, among other things, that he is attended by two tiny satellites, or moons, never seen before."

Other things have ben learned about Mars: "For instance, we feel quite sure now that Mars has an atmosphere, though not more than half as dense as our own, but far better than none, as we can tell by looking at our bright though dead and desolate moon, from which air and water have long since disappeared. And if Mars has air, the polar caps alone would seem to show that he has also ice and snow; and there appear to be, as well, areas of water or marsh, though less in extent than the land. The northern hemisphere looks brighter through the telescope, even showing tints of red and yellow, which astronomers are inclined to think are chiefly dry land, probably desert; while the southern is dark, the 'seas' brown or dull gray, quite as water might appear. These spots were first called seas, like the smooth regions of the moon, and the name continues in both, whatever they may be."-Farm and Fireside.

Bear Trap Caught a Man. Herman Kratz, a homsteader, who lived seventeen miles northwest of Ely, northeastern Minnesota, mysteriously disappeared last September, and no trace was ever found of him until a few days ago, when the skeleton of a man supposed to have been Kratz was found by a civil engineer in a deadfall set for bear five or six miles from his place in the deep woods. The flesh had practically all disappeared from the skeleton, but the scalp and hair still remained in part. The clothing was rotted away so that it was of little use for purposes of identification.

One puzzling thing is that the hair seems somewhat gray, while the hair of the missing homesteader was dark brown, but it thought that the terplow, too, is the surest and quickest | ror of his situation in the bear trap
