SONGS OF KABIR.

In the 15th century in India lived Kabir, weaver and poet. He was born of Mohammedan parents and became familiar with their religion first. Then he studied under a teacher of Hindu faith and was also influenced by study of the religion of Persia. Kabir wove his deeply religious poetry as he did his cloth, combining many threads into one fabric. Woven into it also was a strong feeling for simplicity, for the beauty of the common life of ordinary people. Had he lived in some other land he might have been called a saint.

A modern poet, Tagore, has translated many of Kabir's poems into English.

Kabir taught that God was everywhere, and the human heart found rest only when united with Him. When God's goodness and love flowed into the heart, evil disappeared, pushed out by good.

"The infinite dwelling of the infinite Being is everywhere, in earth, water, sky and air. He who is within is without; I see Him and none else."

"The home is the abiding place; in the home is reality; the home helps to attain Him who is real. So stay where you are, and all things shall come to you in time."

HOME MARKET OUR BEST BET.

Warning that foreign trade is not the magic formula for solving postwar problems, Senator Arthur Capper of Kansas points out that the best market in the world for our manufactured products is in the agricultural sections of the United States.

"While it may be somewhat premature, with the end of the war not yet in sight, I believe it is worth our while to think about the future and study some problems that are bound to arise," he writes in the March issue of Capper's Farmer.

"The biggest problem after the war, will be to maintain full production on farms and in factories so all workers can be employed at good wages. There is no simple solution for it. In recent weeks some folks have hailed foreign trade as a magic method of solving postwar problems. It looks easy, but it isn't."

"Trade involves exchange. If foreign nations buy from us, we must buy from them. Perhaps if they like what we have and nobody offers as good merchandise at a lower price, they will buy our goods and services."

"Even then, foreign countries will be our customers only if: 1—We buy an equal amount of goods and services from them; 2—We give them the goods and services without charge as under lend-lease; or 3—We lend them the money with which to pay for the things they get from us."

"Now I am in favor of foreign trade. I think it should be expanded when that can be done to our advantage. We buy great quantities of raw materials from other nations. Certainly they should purchase an equal amount of our products. That is a healthy situation. In this war we have consumed vast quantities of our natural resources such as iron, copper, oil, lumber. We can very well, it seems to me, increase our purchases of such materials from other nations to replenish or conserve our supplies."

"But in solving the postwar problems of full employment on farms and in factories, we must depend largely, I believe, on the domestic market rather than on foreign trade."

"Let us look at this domestic market. In the United States we have built up the highest standard of living of any people of the world. It is based on the highest wage rate in the world. And along with high wages and high per capita income we also have a higher price level than the world price level on most commodities."

"Now we are not aiming to give that up. We will not be content to drop our standards to the level of the people in other nations. 'This high standard, high wage, high price domestic market of ours consumes the bulk of the food and the merchandise we can produce. If we can expand that domestic market, if we can maintain prosperity in it, perhaps we can absorb even more of our production there."

"If we are to survive the terrific costs of this war we have got to keep our domestic economy strong, we have got to keep our factories and our farms busy, we have got to produce more and consume more of everything here at home. And for full measure, we must sell what we can in foreign lands and buy from them the products they have that we need."

Texas Independence Day

MARCH 2

Just one hundred and nine years ago, a little group of stout hearted men, assembled at a little town called Washington, were brazen enough to defy General Santa Ana of Mexico, and his mighty army then marching through this land we call Texas, and declared their independence, and in less than two months time were able to make good that declaration and become the Lone Star republic of Texas.

Gen. Sam Houston was the military leader of the rough group that was called an army. What they lacked in many other ways, they more than made up in determination to win for themselves and their friends that which all men were wanting --- liberty to live without fear of interference from others, and the right to live in peace and happiness.

But those men did not know that once that liberty and peace was won it would not remain won, but that men must fight for that right again and again. Despots would continue to rise and fight for power as long as human desires remain in man.

Today we are living that period again --- we are striking the enemy on his own grounds to strike before he has become powerful enough to invade our shores --- to help those across the seas enjoy a measure, at least, of what our ancestors fought for so valiantly in 1836.

The struggle against tyranny is eternal. There can be no rest.
