 Why a Bank Turns Down a Loan

There are four reasons in this article another one will follow next week

REASON NO. 1 WAS PRINTED LAST WEEK

REASON NO 2

Because the applicant's financial statement fails, in the opinion of the bank's loan committee, to indicate that he has a reasonable chance. to repay a loan, no matter how much he may want or expect to, Such an applicant's quick assets, his stock of salable goods, his operating costs, his record of sales and profits, his cash position, etc.; must be measured up against his liabilities and the unfavorable factors he faces in his business. The loan committee does this, and usually if it has the least doubt, further information is asked in order to make sure that the applicant receives the fullest possible consideration

That the decision comes down in the end to a matter of opinion cannot be helped. That is the only way there is to reach a decision. The loan committee which refuses is not always right of course; every bank will admit that. Its members can only do what their best judgment tells them to do They can only use their knowledge, experience and common

The relationship between loan officers and customera thus becomes a very personal one. It therefore takes something out of a loan officer to have to tell someone he knows, trusts and perhaps admires and wishes to help that the loan committee has refused his application, just as being refused discourages a customer who thinks he is worthy of credit,
