What Does the War Mean to Business?

If subsequent analysis bear out present predictions that the American business curve is bending upward once more, full credit for the expansion of domestic markets is likely to go to the war abroad. There is scant reason to deny that any European conflict should produce some effect on American business. No one in this country believed indices would be unaffected when hostilities broke out in September.

It is too early to forecast accurately the eventual results of Europe's conflict on business trends in the United States, but it is interesting to note the theory that the war was merely the instrument rather than the cause of expansion. This point of view is taken by The Annalist in its quarterly review and business forecast edition.

Since the United States was swept into the depression in 1929, industrial production has curved downward, despite a continued increase in population, it is pointed out. From comparative charts, it is concluded that demand for manufacturing output has been restrained during the past 10 years almost to the point where increased consumption must become inevitable.

"It seems reasonable to conclude that the outbreak of war has been merely the spark needed to touch off the latent demand for goods suggested by the marked disparity since 1929 between the growth of the population and the trend of industrial production," The Annalist declares. It follows as a corollary that if a sharp decline would come after the cessation of hostilities, business would shortly find its own level again and proceed with the interrupted expansion.

Furthermore, an increasingly large group of American economists and industrialists say that if the United States enters the war, the post-war outlook would be black. Excessive profits during the period of the war would be clipped by high taxes. Even though there might be enough left to give industrialists an ample share, the somber after-effects do not appeal to business men today.

This country does not want another 1929. Excesses in the business cycle must be eliminated in favor of a steady market flow. War profiteering, in its most sinister connotation, can produce no healthy results. So far, American business men want none of it. For the most part, they have expressed their desire to ride with the normal trend, foregoing the hasty profits that may later lead to ruin.

After reading of Britain's method of bombing, we wait to hear reports of the first casualty hit by a bundle of propaganda handbills.

"Embargo Debate Opens Today," reads the headline. "May Last a Month." In these times of propaganda and exaggeration, it is comforting to view a bit of understatement in the news.

• BRUCE CATTON IN WASHINGTON

WASHINGTON.—After all these years, a way to pump a little life into the veins of some of those long-dead South American debts is being worked out here. Strictly speaking, those debts are no direct concern of the government, because they're owed to banks and individuals and not to the government. But they're one of the key pieces in the complicated jigsaw puzzle that has got to be put together before the United States can cash in on the new export trade opportunity opened to the south by the European war. So the debts, along with many other things, have been getting serious study from the government's crack business advisers, notably the staff that is beginning to make its presence so evident in the Department of Commerce. The debts come into the picture like this, as these experts see it: Before South America can really boost its purchases of United States goods it has got to sell more things to the United States. Right now it can't do that to any great extent—as this week's hearings on the proposed Argentine trade treaty demonstrated, with high-powered senators dashing in to protest vehemently against letting the tariff sag down to Argentine goods. But South America has vast undeveloped resources, and if those resources were properly developed there would be a lot of things the United States could and would buy—various mineral products, for instance, oil, jute and manila fibers, hardwoods, and so on. South America can't develop those resources very fast, because it doesn't have the money, and it those default debts give it a very bad credit rating. The scheme now under consideration in regard to the debts then, would go something like this: Defaulted debts in Brazil (to take one country as a sample) run to something like $350,000,000. Those debts are in dollar bonds and Brazil has no dollars to spare. However, she does have plenty of milreis, which aren't worth much outside of Brazil but which, due to export restrictions, are plenty good inside the country. Suppose, then (say the experts), that some arrangement were worked out whereby those bonds were changed from dollar bonds into milreis bonds. Payments could be resumed, but they would be made in milreis—which can't be taken out of the country and wouldn't do the bondholders any good if they could be. Part of the arrangement, therefore, would be for the bondholders to invest their newly-gotten milreis in Brazil—in some of these undeveloped resources above mentioned. It wouldn't be quite as simple as that, of course. It is suggested that there probably would have to be some scaling down of the debts, and that it might also be necessary to send a little fresh money into the country; one suggestion is that new investments be matched against the old, dollar for dollar. But in any case, the idea is that in this way the bondholders would have something to show for their money. Brazil would begin to develop her resources. As a result, she would be able to sell more goods to the United States without stepping on the toes of any American producers. She would then be able to buy more goods from the United States, and, in the end, the bondholders would at last start getting

Medical Corps Of Army Needing Men To Fill Vacancies

FT. SAM HOUSTON, San Antonio, Tex.—The Army Medical Department needs new men for replacements and expansion, recruiting officers said today. The men are needed for training as technicians in the Medical, Dental, and Veterinary Services. Many of the Army's highly trained men are continually leaving the service for private employment in bacteriological, dental, or X-ray laboratories. "Our young men get our training and then get married and leave us," one medical officer complained. "We have too heavy a turn-over. They are even purchasing their discharges in order to get private employment after being educated by us," he said. After the men are given a few weeks of general military and physical training, they are placed in the branches of the department where their interests and abilities will be most productive. One man may be put to work as an apprentice in the medical laboratory or as, while another may be assigned to the dental laboratory to assist in the manufacture of artificial teeth. Men interested in animal husbandry and the inspection of forage are placed in the Veterinary Service. If a man appears to be good material for an X-ray expert he will be made an assistant to the hospital X-ray technicians. Men who show ability in such positions are given the rating of specialists, with increased pay. Four months' courses of more than 600 hours of actual instruction at one of the Medical Department professional service schools are open to men of outstanding ability. These schools are located at the Army Medical Center, just outside Washington, D. C. While the number of men sent to the schools is comparatively small, yet the number of men who excel in all activities of life is likewise small, medical officers pointed out. There is always opportunity for the serious-minded, intelligent young man, they said. The Army Dental School gives courses in dental mechanics, oral hygiene and dental X-rays. In the dental mechanics course the student is instructed in the tools, equipment, materials, and methods of tooth carving, and in all the latest methods of replacement work from the construction of simple Courses in animal management and in meat and dairy hygiene are conducted by the Army Veterinary School. Young men interested in animal husbandry can there learn veterinary hygiene, anatomy, physiology, and first-aid. To those interested in food inspection, instruction is given in analytical, chemical, and bacteriological examination of milk, fresh meats, processed meats, oils and fats, poultry and eggs, dairy products, and fruits and vegetables. Instruction is also given in inspection of poultry and dairy farms. The Army Medical School trains laboratory students in the techniques of blood cultures, Wasserman tests, analysis of drinking water, and study of specimens, chemically and microscopically, for bacteria. These courses are known technically as bacteriology, chemistry, helminthology, protozoology, haematology, and serology. The X-ray technician's course embraces X-ray physics, wiring diagrams, maintenance and repair of equipment, films and processing, Roentgen and surface anatomy, fluoroscopy, manipulation of X-ray units, and localization of foreign bodies. Enlisted men whose interests and abilities lie in administration and nursing are sent to the Medical Field Service School at Carlisle Barracks, near Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, for a four months' course. Administrative work, to the extent of typewriting and filing, is also taught at the other schools.

Texas Bureau Of Business Research To Pattern Business

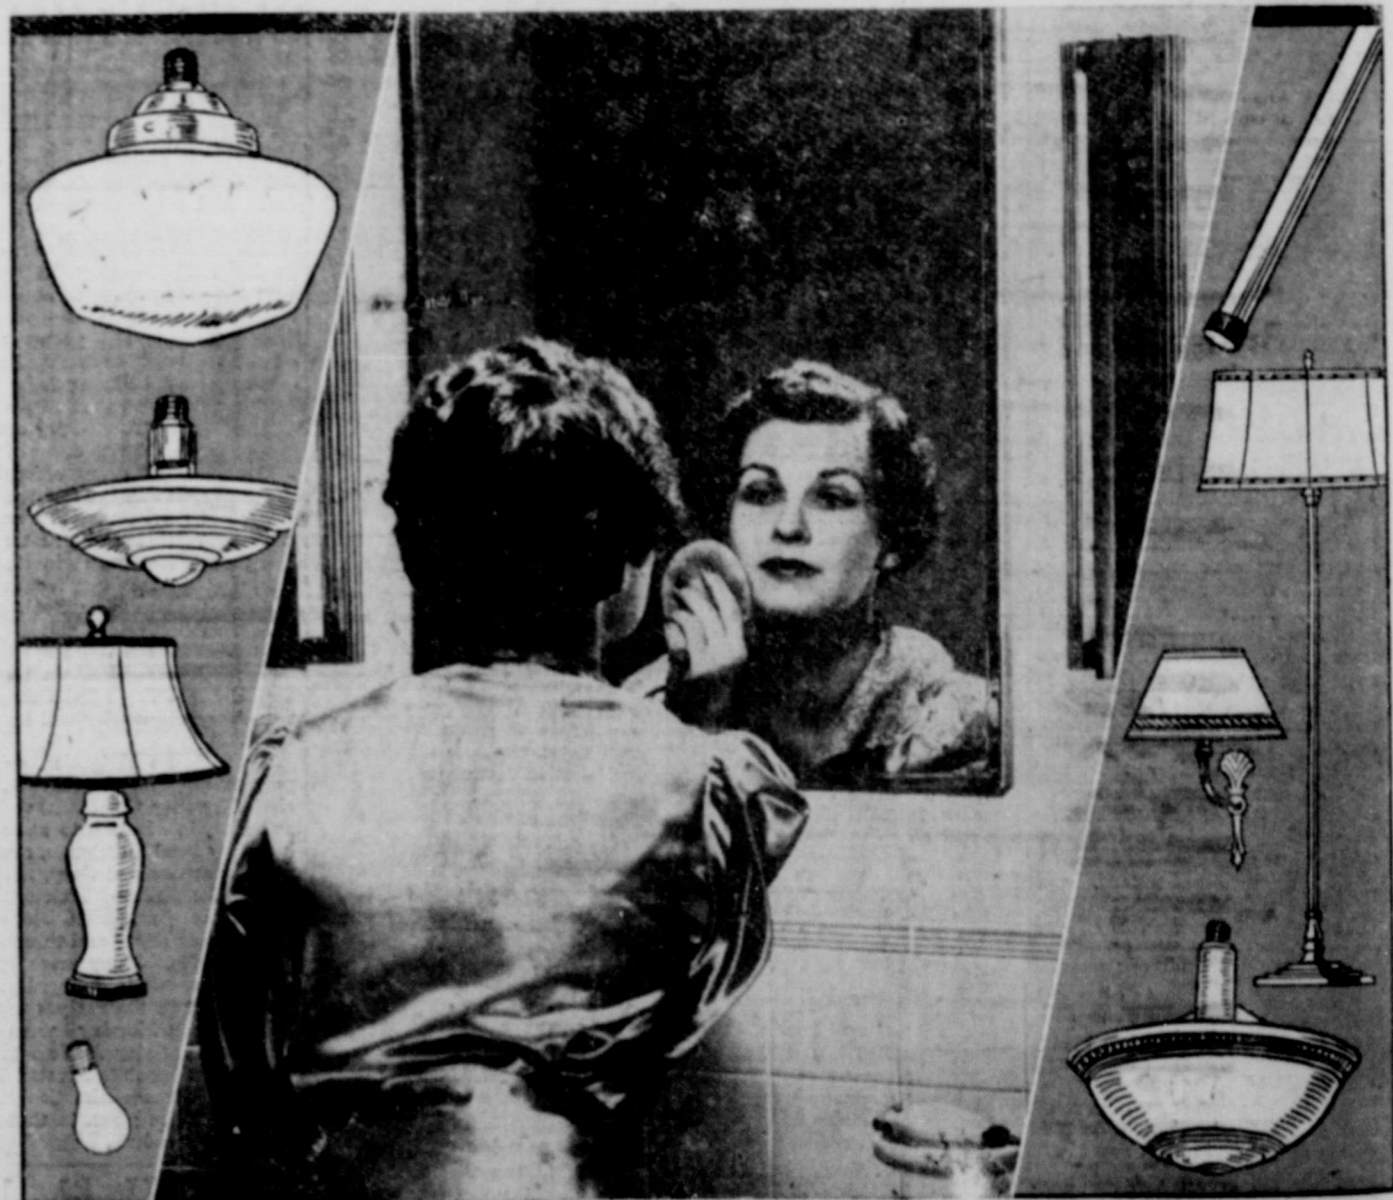

AUSTIN, Tex.—The University of Texas Bureau of Business Research, recognized as one of the outstanding agencies of its kind in the nation, will be used as a pattern for future business research units growing out of a federal-state government cooperative movement.

The University bureau's director, Dr. A. B. Cox, has returned from a three-day conference with United States Department of Commerce officials in Washington, D. C. Object of the conference was to plan a coordinating program among business research agencies throughout the nation.

Dr. Cox said that within the next three months, a department official will inspect business fact-finding organizations in the various state universities. With an eye toward synchronizing institutional business research, the department will also conduct a nation-wide questionnaire survey.

Judge Refuses To Injoin Payment Of Assistance Loan

AUSTIN, Oct. 31.—District Judge Ralph Yarbrough today refused to enjoin payment of $1,330,000 out of old age assistance funds to meet an obligation for funds provided by bankers in 1936 for old age assistance. Payment of the first installment of $200,000 resulted in a $6 reduction in pensions paid old people in Texas in October.
