CHAPTER I

The Broken Message The messenger was peering at the card above the push-button beside the apartment entrance as I came up the

"Cheshy" he said laconically, extending a pink envelope. "He lives here," I answered. "I'll sign for it."

The boy clumped of downstairs, and I let myself in, never dreaming that I held the key to destiny in my hand-or rather, in the pink envelope. My cousin, Betty King bailed me Palm SpringS from the couch on which she sat between her father and Hugh.

"Here you are at last," she cried. "Dad and I have ~ me to say good-by to you. We are going to Constan-

"I have a theory," explained my uncle, Vernon King, "that the upheav als of the war and the occupation of the city by Christian garrisons should be productive of rich opportunities for bibliophiles like myself, aside from an enhanced chance for archeological research."

"Well, I wish you luck," I grum bled. "And I wish I was not tled down .c an architect's drawing-board." "Matter of fact, I'm about fed up with Wall Street," growled Hugh.

"Nobody can make money any more." "It's very funny,' remarked Betty. Both you and Jack announced when you settled down after the war, Hugh, that nothing could ever root you up again. All you wanted, you said, was a good job and plenty of hard work." "I know it," admitted Hugh. "I remember Nash, here, and Nikka Za-

"You - ean the famous gypsy violinist? interrupted my uncle, who, I ought to say, uses the millions be res fres from his oil holdings to patronize the arts and sciences.

"Yes, sir. He was in the Foreign Legion during the war. We all met in the last big push. The last time we got together before demobilization we agreed we never wanted to feel the threat of danger again. We wanted to become rich and prosperous and fat and contented. That was why I came over to New York with Jack, instead of staying home and fighting with my

"That reminds me," I said, extending the pink envelope. "Here's a cable for you. Maybe-"

"If it's from Uncle James I shall be surprised," replied Hugh, ripping open the envelope. "A line once in six months is his idea of avuncular correspondence. Hullo!"

He pursed his lips in a prolonged whistle. "Anything wrong?" asked Betty.

anxiously. "No-well-humph! It's hard to say. Listen to this: "Sailing Aquitania today due New York eighteenth must see you immediately have important discovery your aid essential family fortunes involved this confidential."

"Yes, on second thought, it is wrong. all wrong. He's after that treasure again. Oh, tord! I did my best to persuada him to be sensible before i eft England with Jack."

"A treasure!" Betty exclaimed But you never told me about it!" "Oh, it's a long story," protected Hugh. "Frightfully boring. It's supposed to be located in Constantinople. and my uncle has spent his life and most of the family's property trying to find it. That's why I have to ... ase money in New York instead of play ing the country gentleman. There was little enough to the family treasury before Uncle James reached it. Now - Well, the new lord, who will procably be me, will find trouble paying the herald's fees, let alone succession duties." "You really are too exasperating." declared Betty. "A treasure story is never boring."

"I am on Betty's side," said ber father.

My uncle Vernon is a very decent sort, despite the fact that he is a millionaire. He is a professor several times over, and bates the title. And he is one of the few learned men ! know who can be genuinely interested in low-brow diversions. "So am i," I said, backing him up "You have been gullty of secrecy with your friends, which is an English vice I thought I had broken you of, Hugh Come clean !" "But there's so little to tell," Hugh mid. "I had an ancestor about seven bundred years ago, who is generally called Hugh the First. This Hugh was son to Lord James, who went to the Crusades and was a famous charecte in his time. On his way to Faiestine, the stories say, James stayed a while with the Emperor Andronicus who roled in the Eastern empire-"

"Very interesting," nodded King "And this treasure is supposed to be in Constantinopie!" exploded Betty "Where we are going! Isn't that so Hugh?"

"Yes, it is always located in Constantinople," answered Hugh. "In fact it is generally referred to as the Treasure of the Bucoleon, which, I anderstand, was the principal palace of the Eastern emperors."

"Quite right," agreed Vernon King. his scholar's interest whipped aflame. "It was a magnificent residence, vying with the palace of the Caesars in Rome. I have been in Constantinopie for extended periods upon several oc-rasions, and I have never satisfied of any bona fide portions of the Bucoleon. The older portions of the city have been so overbuilt since the Turk ish conquest that frequently what is ostensibly a relatively modern building turns out to be almost unbelievably ancient at the core. But the prejudices of the Turks and their distaste for foreign-"

Betty, chewing her fingers with impatience, waved to her father to be silent

"Daddy!" she exclaimed. "Really you aren't lecturing, you know! Do let Hugh get on with the treasure." "But I'm afraid I've gotten as far as I can," replied Hugh. "The tradition simply says that Andronicus confleded the secret of the location to Lord James. Then Andronicus was assassinated an! James was thrown in to prison by his successor. Hugh, James' son, went to Constantinople with an army of Latin Crusaders who had decided that the best way to help the Holy land was to establish a friendly base there. The Crusaders captured the city, and Hugh rescued his father. Then they returned to England. Before James died he passed on the secret of the treasure to Hugh. There are documents in the Charter

Chest-" "What's that?" demanded Betty. "It's a terribly old oaken box, bound with copper and steel," explained Hug's. "We keep it in a safe deposit

"Nonsense!" Said Retty, "It's as Good 1 Treasure Story as I Ever Read."

For many generations the Lords of Chesby were too busy to hunt treasure so far from home."

"One Lord tried it in Harry the Fifth's time, but the Greeks watched him so closely that he thought himself lucky to escape from Constantinople with his life. Then the Turks captured the city, and after that it was too risky-except for one chap in Elizabeth's reign. He was Lord James, the sixteenth baron, a shipmate of Raieigh and Drake and Hawkins, and he feared nothing that lived. He put in at Constantinople and bearded the Grand Turk in his lair. But even he did no. venture to make a genuine ses th in view of the conditions that prevailed. From his time on few of the family bothered win the tradition until Uncle James commenced to me tgage farms to finance his researches."

"Then you have no definite know! edge of the location of the treasure?" asked King, "No chart or-" Hugh laughed bitterly.

"No, sir, that is just why I feel so peevish over the way Uncle James has devastated the estate. It's a search for a needle in a haystack-and s needle that in all probability never existed, at that"

"I fear so," assented King. "Nonsense," said Betty. "It's as good a treasure story as I ever read. Why shouldn't it be true? Could you imagine a more perfect place for concealing a treasure all these centuries than Constantinople? I for one intend to believe in it and if your uncle wants any help in hunting for it, he can count on me." "We'll all belp him, if it comes to that, I said. "Nikka Zaranko would never forgive us if we left him out of such a party."

"Uncle James will have nothing tangible to go on," said Hugh. "You can stake your last shilling on that. He's never had a same idea yet. I couldn't honestly encourage him in any more coolishness." "Perhaps," suggested King, "his visit has nothing to do with the treasure." Hugh chuckled, his merry self again. "Cross the Atlantic just to look me up? Not a chance, sir. His ruling passi. is driving him on. Confound it, though! I wish this hadn't come up. And I wish I didn't crave adventure again. And I wish you weren't going to Constantinople."

"How about giving the Kings a line to Nikka in Paris or wherever he is?" I asked. "Thanks," said Betty, "but we're going vis the Mediterranean. The best thing for you boys to do is to pack up th Hugh's uncle, collect your friend Nikka en route and follow on." "No go," answered Hugh dismally. "All I am scheduled for is a fat famlly row."

. . . . . . . The steamship company telephoned while Hugh and I were at breakfast to say that the Aquitania was just docking. When we reached the pler West, street was swarming with out-going automobiles loaded with the first contingents of debarking passengers. We surrendered our passes and dived into the swirling vortex of harried travelers, bysterical relatives and impassive customs officials.

The purser's office in the main saloon was vacant, but Hugh buttonholed a passing steward.

"Lord Chesby, sir? Yes, sir, he was one of the first ashore. There was a gentleman to meet him, I think, sir." "That's queer," muttered Hugh as we returned to the gangway. "Who could meet him beside us?"

"It's damned queer," I agreed "What does your uncle look like?" "He's small, stocky, not fat. Must be around sixty," said Hugh vaguely. We surveyed the space in the customs lines under the letter C.

"No, he's not here," said Hugh. "Wait, though, there's Watkins!" "Who's Watkins?" I asked, boring a "He's Uncle James' man."

Watkins was the replica of Hugh's description of his uncle. He was a chunky, solid sort of man, with the maskilke face of the trained English

"Hullo, Watty?" Hugh greeted him. "Where's my uncle?"

The valet's features lighted up. "Ah, Mister Hugh! I'm very glad to see you, sir, if I may say so. 'Is ludship, sir? Why, 'e went off with your messenger, sir."

"My messenger?" Hugh repeated blankly.

"Yes, sir. The dark gentleman. Your man, 'e said 'e was, sir." "My man!" Hugh appealed to me.

"Did you hear that, Jack?"

Watkins became suddenly anxious. "There's nothing wrong, I 'ope, sir? The gentleman came aboard to find us, and told 'is ludship how you'd been delayed, and 'e was to come along to your rooms, sir, whilst I saw the Ju-gage through the customs.

Wasn't that right, sir?" Hugh sat down on a trunk "It's right enough, Watty," he groaned, "except that I never sent such a message and I haven't a man." "What sort of a man was this messenger?" I asked.

Watkins turned to me, a look bewilderment in his face.

"An eastern-looking gentleman, 'e was, sir, like the gypsies 'is indship occasionally 'as down to Chesby. "How long ago did Uncie James leave, Watty?" asked Hugh. "Nearly an hour, sir."

"Time enough for him to have reached the apartment. Jack, do you mind telephoning on the off-chance? I'll fetch an inspector to go over this stuff."

I had no difficulty in getting the apartment. The cleaning woman who "did" for us answered. No, nobody had called, and there had been no telephone messages. I hastened back to the C space with a sense of ugly forebodings.

"Do you know, Jack," said Hugh seriously, "I am beginning to think that something sinister may have hap-pened? Wa tells me that he and Uncle James are just come from Constantinopie. He says my uncle went there convinced that he had discovered the key to the treasure's Mding-place, but in some unexplained way Uncle James was deterred from carrying out his plans, and they returned burriedly to England."

"And now I think of it, sir," amended Warkins, "we 'ave been shadowed ever since we went to Turkey. I never paid much attention to them, considering it was coincidence like, but it's been one dark gentleman after another at the Pera Palace hotel in Constantinople, on the Orient express, in London when we called on 'is ludship's solicitor. After his conversation with Mr. Bellowes 'e sent the cablegram to you, sir. And 'e 'ad the Charter Chest sent up from the safe deposit vaults -but that was before we went to Turkey, to be sure, sir."

"It was, eh? Hugh was all interest. "How was that?"

"Why, sir, 'e rang for me one day at Chesby, and 'e was rubbin' 'is 'ands together like he does when 'e's pleased, and 'e said: 'Watkins, we're goin' to run down to Constantinople. Wire Mr. Bellowes to 'ave the Charter Chest sent up from the bank. I must 'ave another look at it-' 'e was talkin' to himself, sir-'l wonder if the hint might not 'ave been in the Instructions, after all."

Hugh jumped.

"By Jove, he has been after the reasure! The Instructions is the original parchment on which Hugh the First inscribed his command to his son to go after the treasure-carefully leaving out, however, the directions for finding it. Dammit, I knew the old boy was up to some foolishness. If he's taken on some giddy crew of crooks for a piratical venture-"

"He wouldn't have called on you for help." I cut him off. "True," assented Hugh. "But I wish I could take some stock in the nonsense at the bottom of it." "I wonder!" I said. "I'm drifting to Betty's belief that there is more in the treasure story than you think.' "It's bunk, I tell you," said Hugh thoroughly disgusted. "Watty, collect some porters and get this baggage down to the taxi stand."

The cleaning woman was still in the apartment when we returned, and she reiterated her assertion that nobody had called. We had some lunch. and then, on Watkins' suggestion, 1 rang up hotels for two hours-without any result. At the end of my tether I hung up the receiver and joined Hugh in gloomy reflection on the couch.

"There's one thing more to do," said Hugh suddenly. "Telephone the police.

"What do you think of that?" asked Mrs. Sparrow.

"All nonsense," said Mr. Sparrow "None of the other birds," he continued, "want to live with us because they say we're so quarrelsome.

"It's all very well to have sweet dispositions but you see our quarrelsome natures help us. "For we will be left alone and we

"We will just stay here," said Mr.

"But it's a two-family house," said Mrs. Sparrow. "That makes no difference. Our children will keep away any other family, and we will stay right on. "The grown-ups rent houses for a year, so why shouldn't we?"

"But what rent shall we pay?" asked Mrs. Sparrow. "When they come around and say,

"'Rent due,' we will chirp; "'Get out of here, get out of here, and our voices will be so shrill and cross they'll go away at once."

"That's a fine scheme," said Mrs. Sparrow. "We'll certainly keep this house for a year." "And," went on Mr. Sparrow, "If they think their bird house is so very grand we'll show them that no house

The sparrows nudged each other and said, "We'll fool them."

So the sparrows lived in the beautiful bird house, and the sparrow children slept downstairs with their heads under their wings while Mr. and Mrs. Sparrow lived above and slept in the upstairs rooms with their heads under their wings. And they made up their minds they'd never leave such a nice house.

Something to Make

A pretty little toy boat can be made out of a piece of wood and a scrap of soap. It needs no sail, and will continue moving as long as there is any soap left. Cut out the boat with a sharp knife, and make it about two inches long, pointed at one end (the bow), and blunt at the other (the stern). Dip it in parattin for a moment-this is necessary, as otherwise it would not swim without a sailand stick a little piece of soap on the stern so as to cover that end on the boat. Now put it gently on a large basin of water, and in a minute or two it will begin moving slowly forward. The soap acts as a very tiny motor, and by dissolving in the water drives

Valuable Salvage

The rumbler, a new device to salvage brass from worn out light bulbs, is announced by the New York Edison company. The name describes the noise made in reclaiming the brass socket shells, the only parts considered worth saving. In shape it is a cylinder, of 500-bulb capacity, with two sets of steel teeth set on bars inside. While the drum revolves, they chew to bits glass and filament, which fall out of holes in the bottom leaving the shells shiny and clean. The company reclaims about 300,000 shells yearly. Until the rumbler was devised the work was done by hand.
