No Soil, but Presto! Cucumbers!

"Everyone could have a garden in his bathtub," says Miss Teddy Price of Abernathy, amateur biologist at Texas State College for Women, as she points proudly to her prize specimens in a "Water Culture" experiment. This cucumber and tomato vine are two of a whole greenhouse full of plants and vegetables which have been cultivated without soil, in clean sand and a chemical solution.

With the aid of Miss Willie 1. Birge, head of the biology department, Teddy prepared a culture solution containing potassium, calcium, magnesium, nitrogen, sulphur, iron, borax, copper and zinc, a line-up which seems a far cry from plain dirt. Plants can be grown in water tanks, but the sand gives support, and solution is applied to it at regular intervals. Water culture is now used in a small way commercially.
