Time To Begin Early Cotton Insect Control

Farmer County Agent Joe Jones this week advised that farmers should get a start on early-season insect control measures as soon as wells have watered the seedlings. That's why it is important for farmers to continually check the young plants.

The first sign of thirsty insects in a newly-vegetated cotton is the plant starting to wilt. Some pests normally cause the most wide-spread damage from the time they are about three or four days old. Therefore, it is absolutely essential to start control efforts as soon as possible.

Jones noted that some pests start causing noticeable injury to cotton even before the seedlings are up. The number of these and other early-season pests varies from county to county, depending upon weather conditions and the agronomic practices followed. Jones said that growers should be on the lookout for early signs of damage and take appropriate action.

Farms that have had to water their seedlings early can use this as an opportunity to apply early-season insecticides. Jones also stressed the importance of starting control efforts early to prevent the proliferation of pests. He added that growers who notice damage should act immediately to prevent further injury to the young plants.

The Texas Agricultural Extension Service recommends that farmers keep a watchful eye on their cotton seedlings and begin control measures as soon as possible to ensure a successful season.

Jones recommended that growers use a combination of fungicides and insecticides to control pests effectively. He noted that growers can achieve better results by applying the right combination of products at the right time.

The brochures, titled "Guide for Controlling Cotton Insects," were prepared by the Texas Agricultural Extension Service. Growers are encouraged to use these resources to help manage pests effectively and ensure a successful cotton season.
