Bayou Philosopher Takes Issue With Expert Who Contends Machines Now Do Most Of Nation's Work On Farms

Editor's note: The Bayou Philosopher on his Johnson grass farm on the Bayou is talking about work this week which apparently is about all he ever does about it.

Dear editar:

Just for the novelty of the thing, to keep from getting stale, I lit in and worked pretty hard for a while on my farm out here yesterday, and after I'd been going pretty steady for three or four hours I headed for the shade and was sitting there getting my breath back and after a while I pulled a newspaper out of my pocket and glanced over it, just to get my mind off the rest of the work still to be

I was reading along not paying much attention to what I was looking at when suddenly I caught an article that made me go back and take a second

According to it, an expert has announced that "today, humans and animals together do perhaps one per cent of all the work. The rest is done by machines." I thought this over a long time. There was bound to be a catch in it, but I couldn't find it right off. Maybe, when you add up all the work in the world, counting every time a piston moves, etc., machines actually do 99 per cent of it and human beings and horses do the rest, but it only works out that way on paper. From me and the horse's standpoint, those figures sure do leave something out.

And if you ever find a farmer who does one per cent of the work making a crop and the tractor does the other 99, I'd like to study his methods. The catch is that while machines may be doing most of the work, there's a blame lot more being done. It used to be that 40 acres and one mule plus a man was a pretty sizeable farming unit, and while nowadays a man with four- or six-row equipment can farm three or four hundred acres, let's not confuse 1 per cent of the total work with 1 per cent of the working time. It's not the number of acres a man farms, it's the number of hours, and despite all the technological progress and mechanical marvels, hasn't anybody been able to substitute a sunup to sundown day for a farmer when planting time arrives. Machines may do 99 per cent of the world's work, but they don't do 99 per cent of mine. The way mine's divided, machines do about 30 per cent, I do about 25, and the rest never does get done.

Yours faithfully,

Congratulations GRADUATES

We extend our heartiest congratulations to the Class of '55 on a job — well-done! It has been a pleasure to witness how you have 'pitched in' and done a meritorious job in an Age filled with distractions, threatened by insecurity.

We are certain that you will tackle the future with the same spirit. And never forget that a worthwhile Future is based on the habit of Thrift. A Savings Account is an excellent beginning!
