DISCRETION IN GOVERNMENT

In the days when the American government was in its infancy and the Constitution was being written, there were many debates and discussions about how power should be divided and how decisions should be made. One of the most important issues was the question of whether the federal government should have the discretion to negotiate treaties and make international agreements without the consent of Congress.

The argument for discretion was that the country had to have the power to act quickly and decisively in international affairs. If Congress had to approve every treaty, the United States would be at a disadvantage in the world. The argument for Congress was that the Constitution was clear that treaties must be approved by a two-thirds vote of both houses of Congress.

In the end, a compromise was reached. The Constitution was amended to allow the president to negotiate treaties, but they had to be ratified by two-thirds of the Senate. This system has worked well for more than two centuries, and it has prevented the United States from being held hostage by its enemies.

The issue of discretion in government is still relevant today. There are many situations where the government needs to act quickly and decisively, but it cannot do so unless it has the power to act without the consent of Congress. This is why it is important to have a system of checks and balances in our government. It ensures that no one branch of government becomes too powerful and that the people's interests are protected.

ONCE WASTEFUL POTATO TOPS

Once considered a nuisance, the problem of what to do with the rest of the potato plant was solved recently after a Danish chemist discovered that the waste could be useful. In harnessing plant juices to its flavor, after washing and bruising, the vegetable is turned to brown paper bags and pressed between huge rollers so as to extract the juice. In several hours, after which time a fine sugar is formed, the juice is filtered and then run through special filters to purify it.
