> The people of the Danish West Indies are not regarded so intelli gent as our own, but they appear to have made an important improvement in the administration of Justice and in diminishing litigation. They have established reconciling courts, at which parties must appear and an attempt be made to reconcile their differences before permission is given to commence an action at law. It is the business of the judges of these courts to en-deavor, by all the means that are in their power, to effect an amicable adjustment of all matters in dispute between parties, to explain the law, to give advice and to act as arbitrators. Failing to perfect an adjustment of difficulties at the first meeting, the parties are given time for consideration, and on a given day they are again called to some turn of affairs which shall do as gether, when another attempt is much for them as the last five weeks have made for a settlement. If this fails, a certificate is given to the com-plainant by the judges of the recon-ciling court, and he is at liberty to commence an action at law. If, lowever, he brings a suit without having first obtained this certificate, he will be immediatly nonmited. The proceedings before these reconciling courts are attend-
