At the close of the late civil war the condition of the country was as unique as it was contrary to the anticipations of its founders and the prosperity of its supporters.—

The masses, with zealous patriotism, had been so intently watch ing the ebb and flow of the contest that they had neglected to devote any considerable attention to the political economy of the contest to the political economy of the contest to the contest to the political economy of the contest to the contest t political economy of the country; and ordinarily, even when an oc-casional "united" citizen would at tempt to scrutinize the necessities of the crisis, his vol a would be drowned by the politicians frantic cry of "Rebel!" "Yankeel" "Butternut?" "Nigger !" At this june ture, as in the ever memorable "Reign of Terror" in France, the extremes of society united. Thus, bondholders and monopolists controled not only the State Legislatures and the National Congress, but also the great offices surrounding the Executive, who evidently mistaking an excessive patricule legyor for blind subservice, had assumed powers quite regal. The yeomanny of the country, constituting three-louring of the nation, reared the cattle, tilled the fields and paid directly nine-tentra, and indirectly the balance, of the taxes; but the embryonobility of the country, operating severally under the signs of banksers, brokers, boundeders, merchants, boot blacks and lawyers, did the legislation, the major part of which had reference to endless hation. The people of France, into the contract of the merchants and mechanics of the me baggers and others who could vote nation. It is only about three years since the first granger was organized by a few timid, yet carnest and faithfull workers. It now numbers not far from 5,000,000 of the most intelligent and responsible individuals of the land. Operating through the instrumentality of these members, of both political purities, who coincide with them in belief, the Grangers have done more, even during the last year, to bring back the government to the status of pure democracy, than has been accomplished since the days of Jeff.
