TABLES FOR FARMERS. Once upon a time a farmer, deciding that his days of toil were past, retired and put up a shanty on a town lot.

For three weeks he lived in elegance and ease, and ate cold storage eggs and renovated butter.

Between intervals of resting, the farmer spent his time mowing the lawn with his wife's button scissors and kicking about his taxes.

But somehow the place didn't seem like home, and at the end of the third week the farmer sold his place to a pale-faced ribbon counter clerk who didn't know a Berkshire from a Rhode Island Red, and hit the trail back to the farm.

SOWS LIKELY TO COME FAT. Packers in their wisdom have not been worrying about it long.

For many weeks during the winter packing season their cutting operations were with a view to throwing a little material into thelard kettle as possible. Full corn cribs, they argued, would smother the rigs and smother the backs of spring and summer hogs with lard, and this view of the prospect savored of sagacity.

MELINDA'S TANTRUMS

How Household Tyrant Made to See Error of Her Ways.

By CECILLE LANGDON.

"I've stood it for thirty years and I reckon I can last out, now I've got so far," was the homely way in which Ezra Dockrill put it.

"There's no need," insisted his old-time friend, Greg Parsons, "Be sensible, Ezra, and take an old comrade's advice. Melinda Dockrill, your wife, is the very best housekeeper in Carlton, and nobody disputes it. She tends her house and minds her own business so far as her neighbors are concerned, but she has been hard, terribly hard on you."

"Well, you may put it that way for a fact," replied Ezra, stroking his chin reflectively. "What can't be cured must be endured, though. When she puts her foot down it's there, and I'm too wise a man to contradict it."

"All right, Ezra, if you're content to be bossed around like a ten-year-old kid, keep it up, that's all. She's narrowed you down until you don't have half a chance of living. Next thing she won't let you go out after dark, and then good-bye to your lodge, and the reunions, and all your old friends."

There was a good deal of sense and reason to what both men said, and despite Ezra's weak explanations their point of view was practically identical. Ezra was beginning to get the reputation of being henpecked, and his excellent wife, excellent in some ways—had degenerated into a scold. The falling had grown on her because her husband was a long-suffering Ezra, and he had been so much around home that she had got to consider him a sort of a chattel. Just as she put the broom in a certain corner and kept it there, and marched the chickens out at a certain time and marched them in again at another, she ruled her easy-going life partner on her own selected schedule. Melinda Dockrill was fast growing into a household tyrant. When Walter Maywell came courting their pretty daughter, Flora, she opposed the match tooth and nail. When just now some old Spanish-American war comrades of Ezra wanted him to go over to Pelham to a reunion, she hid his old uniform, kept him awake two nights lecturing him on the perniciousness of wasting his time, and flatly refused to allow him to even march to the depot with his friends.

That might have been well enough, for, as said before, Ezra was meek, patient and a self-sacrificing sort of a man. Right on top of this decision of the masterful Melinda, however, there was a scene in the household that appealed to another side of Ezra's nature. Young Maywell had come to Mrs. Dockrill in a frank manner to ask permission to marry Flora. She had put her husband aside in the discussion without even consulting him. The result was that poor Walter went about town, a dejected reproach to the kind-soiled Ezra, and poor Flora mourned till all the happiness seemed gone out of her life. That evening Ezra came down to the Parsons home.

"See here, Greg," he said, "we're talking about Melinda today." "Quite right, Ezra; what about it?" "Why, just this—I've been thinking over what you said."

"About time, I should say," responded Parsons. "I don't care for myself. I can stand Melinda's peculiarities. That poor girl of mine, though, and young Maywell—she's set them grieving their hearts away with her stubborn ways, and it isn't right, it isn't right!"

"Well, what are you going to do about it?" challenged Parsons promptly. "Why," replied Ezra, hesitatingly, "you said—that is, you advised or suggested a little plan to—to make Melinda more—tractable."

"Tractable is a good word," observed Parsons with a snort. "What you're getting at, Ezra, is to break the yoke, throw off the tyrant chains, and emerge as a real free and enlightened citizen of these United States." "I'm sorry for Flora, if you want to know the gist of the matter," explained Ezra. "I don't care for myself, but that poor little thing!"—and Ezra broke down.

"Ezra," said Parsons very seriously, "if you will follow out my directions I'll guarantee to cure your wife of her tantrums inside of a week." "Greg," responded Ezra, grasping the hand of his old-time friend fervidly, "you do just that and I'll give you those old war relics of mine you've coveted so long. What am I to do to help you?"

"Well, first and foremost," answered Parsons very definitely, "you're to sneak out of town early tomorrow morning on the train for Pelham and wait there till you hear from me." If Ezra Dockrill was mystified as to the plan of his friend, his erratic helpmeet had clear hysterics when she found he had defied her authority and had gone to the reunion. She fortified herself with one consolation, however; he would "catch it" when he returned!

But three days later, when the veterans came home from the reunion, her husband was not with them. All the pent-up "dressing down" she had provided for her truant spouse was wasted material. She rushed down to the Parsons home, enraged, then anxious, and finally alarmed.

"I've got a sort of doleful story to tell you, Melinda," said her old friend. "I'm afraid Ezra has broken the traces. It's like a horse checked up too high. Give him the chance and the critter'll sprint."

"Why, what do you mean? Surely nothing serious has happened to Ezra?" cried Mrs. Dockrill, a quick catch in her voice. "It's the warlike spirit, you see, Melinda," explained Mr. Parsons. "Everyone is talking about the Mexican war. Why, there were lots of the old soldiers just wild to enlist. Ezra is a brave man. The war spirit got him. They were recruiting at Pelham. If he's joined the army again he'll make his mark."

It was there that Mrs. Dockrill broke down. It was there that all her real wife's devotion was aroused. She pleaded with Parsons, she implored him to go straight after the home deserter. "Tell you now," observed the specious Parsons, "I might have a little influence with the adjutant general, and Ezra, too, if he really has enlisted. You've got to promise concession. His heart is set on Flora and young Maxwell!"

"I'll agree! I'll agree!" interrupted Mrs. Dockrill vehemently. "Only get my dear husband back and he'll never have to complain of me again." She passed a sleepless night. When that precious old schemer Parsons presented her husband the next day at noon, Melinda threw her arms about the neck of her prodigal spouse, and Parsons sneaked away feeling quite mean for giving so hard a lesson to a deserving though at times somewhat contentious woman.

Melinda was "good as pie" after that, and two happy lovers were allowed to chat across the old front gate as much as they wanted to. If ever Ezra saw the old time spells coming over his wife, he would walk to a big map hanging on the wall. He would not have long to run his finger over Mexico, and Turkey, before Melinda became her usual sniffling self again.

It's a Very Good Yarn. In the old days, when the sturdy men of New Bedford and Nantucket put out to sea in chase of the mighty whale, they used to dream of finding ambergris. A streak of fortune which carried a lump of this stuff across the bows of an old square-rigger might make a small fortune for all hands, even to the lowest one in a hundred laymen stowed away in the forecabin. But the streak of fortune seldom came.

However, the sperm whale continues to give us this concretion and the navigators of the far-off waters sometimes find it. The whaler Norvegia comes hooting into Christchurch, New Zealand, jubilant in the possession of ambergris to the amount of half a ton—at least the cables to the newspapers say it's half a ton. Inasmuch as ambergris has seldom been discovered in quantities exceeding 100 pounds, the accuracy of the scales may perhaps be doubted.

And here's another thing. The same dispatches place the value of the ambergris at $300,000. That is a lot of money for a crew of hard-bitten whalers, yet perhaps it would not be grudged them by a world always ready to applaud good fortune. But ambergris is usually quoted at $5 the ounce. What has caused this tremendous advance? A decline would seem more probable because the discovery of such a quantity might easily overstock the market.

Selling Eggs for Profit

Seventeen Per Cent of Missouri Product Which Is Valued at $3,000,000 Is Unfit for Human Food

It often happens that eggs travel many miles and go through several hands from the time they leave the producer before they reach the consumer. Eggs which are sold at the country store are usually shipped to the nearest egg depot, then sent to the city commission house, which disposes of them to the jobber, who sells to the retailer and he to the consumer.

In most cases the farmer does not handle a sufficient quantity to warrant his catering to a private trade, although there is a great demand for fresh eggs at soda fountains, hotels, restaurants, retailers, etc. Where private trade can be had with little cost of delivery, the producer usually realizes higher prices and the consumer enjoys a higher grade product. Special egg cartons, neatly stenciled cases, uniform grading of the eggs as to size, shape and color all tend toward an attractive product which catches the eye of the consumer, thus calling his attention to the particular producer.

The private egg carton may be packed in the regular 15 or 30 dozen case. The advertising is worth more than the cost of the carton to say nothing of the increased value of the product.

But the great majority of eggs are marketed through the easier channel previously mentioned. They are handled several times and are usually candled once or twice. As a rule, farmers market their eggs once a week; and the groceryman ships as often as he secures enough to make it profitable. A day or two is necessary for the shipment to reach the egg depot; each middleman causes time to elapse, and the age of the egg is indefinite when it reaches the consumer.

Egg candlers eliminate the bad eggs at some time during the journey. The consumer pays only for what he gets. Each middleman deducts his commission, and the farmer or producer receives the value of the eggs less this commission. Many practice selling eggs the age of which is questionable, thinking that the middleman or consumer stands the loss. There could be no more serious mistake. On a trip through commission houses of New York, the writer watched the candling of eggs. About one out of every five was thrown out. Who stands the loss? Does the commission man? He knows from experience the quality he may expect. Does the consumer? He pays for what he gets. The man who stands the loss is the producer, and the loss is the lower price he receives because of the average low quality of the eggs.

A better quality would eliminate this loss; and eventually the producer will reap the benefit, not only because of the increase in price which the commission man can afford to pay, but also because of the demand which will be created for his goods on account of their improved quality. It is a fact that eggs from certain localities and states demand a premium of two or three cents a dozen because of the good reputation their goods have attained.

At the present time there is an enormous loss in the eggs marketed. About 17 per cent, or nearly one-fifth of the eggs marketed, are unfit for food. The elimination of this would mean an addition of $2,000,000 to $4,000,000 to the Missouri farmers in a single year. The loss which occurs in eggs is classified as follows:

- Chick development 5 per cent.
- Dirty eggs 2 per cent.
- Breakage 2 per cent.
- Shrunken or held eggs 5 per cent.
- Rotten eggs 2.5 per cent.
- Mouldy or bad flavored eggs 5 per cent.

The farmer, of course, is responsible for only a portion of this loss, because of delays in transit. Yet he can do much toward the improvement in quality. The following suggestions, if carried out, will help greatly:

- (1). Market only eggs of standard size: 24 ounces or more to the dozen.
 - (2). Sort out exceedingly large or very small eggs.
 - (3). Avoid dirty eggs by use of clean quarters. Dirt may be removed by a damp cloth, but the keeping qualities of the eggs are not as good as of those which are unwashed.
 - (4). Remove males as soon as breeding season is over. Fertile eggs do not keep as well, and the 5 per cent loss can be eliminated. It costs more to feed surplus males, and the hens are more productive when no males are present.
 - (5). Collect eggs from regular nests daily, or even twice daily in hot weather. Stolen nests account for the rotten and moldy eggs.
 - (6). Store eggs in cool, well ventilated places. Heat assists chick development, and also increases the shrinkage. Eggs are very susceptible to such odors as kerosene, cabbage, rotten fruit, fresh paint, etc. Feed also influences favor. Only clean foods should be fed.
 - (7). Market eggs once or twice weekly. An egg deteriorates in quality with age.
 - (8). Grade eggs with reference to color. Eggs of uniform color always command a premium of from 1 to 3 cents a dozen.
- In many localities where these practices are employed eggs sell for about 4 cents a dozen above the market price. When the farmer and the shipper realize the benefits to be obtained by careful handling of eggs, an enormous saving will result.
