From the Western Christian Advocate. Solilogny of a Dying Gold-Digger. DY MRS. S. H. DRYDEN.

THE hour has come-the wished-for time When I with pride on thee should goze: When I should call thy glories mine,

For what I've spent my brighter days.

This golden pile before me now The setting sun is not more bright; And yet I've looked in other years Upon its rays with more delight.

Though now I gaze on thee, fair pile, Dear earnings of my bitter hours, My heart is sad my tears descend, Like rain-drops in an autumn shower.

What am I now? A creature 'reft Of all that's dear to life and love-A bark east loose on life's dark surge, With nothing calm or bright above.

I look upon the early time When fancy's hopes were fondly true; But, sh! since then those hopes have died, And things put on their real hue.

This frame is racked with torturing pain, This body worn by slow disease: O, could I live that early time! O, could I give this gold for ease.

O. could I see beside me one. Dearer than all to love and me! Life hath its woes, but. O, how sad In death to be so far from thee

Alas! 'tis vain ; no tender wife

Can press this death-chilled brow, Nor kiss these lips from which the breath Of life is passing now. "Our father's dead!" methinks I hear

Whispered from little trembling lins : While from each eye the pearly tear Drops down upon my children's cheeks. O, this is sad! my heart-strings ache

A chill comes o'er my wither'd frame; O, take away this heap of gold! O, take it back from whence it came. I did not think this pile of scales Would be my bride when death was near.

Or that these yellow lumps of earth I'd easp instead of children dear. Thro' weary years I've toiled with care. 'Neath scoreling sun and storm and rain: I've left my home, have risked my life,

In dangers thick, for naught but gain For naught but gain, for golden wealth, I've given my all which made me blest: My home my friends, my joy, my health, And now my life must pay the rest.

And yet it cannot bring me now One calm, sweet moment free from pain, Nor light upon these features cast, Nor bring the past to me again.

Eternity is dark with dread. And storm clouds o'er it roll: Alas, I fear, vile yellow dust, For thee I've lost my soul,

Come take it from my aching sight Then raise me up-my puise is gone, California July 1851.
