"Our method of handling the mustangs was the same as that generally adopted and so often described. There were four of us, and we had several good corn-fed horses, which were, of course, much stronger than the grass-fed mustangs. Much has been said and written about walking down a bunch of mustangs, but I never saw any that had much walk about them until they had become so exhausted that they coudn't strike a trot. After starting a bunch of mustangs it was necessary to keep them constantly moving until they became worn-out and susceptible of partial control. A saddle horse would become attracted to a bunch of mustangs, and would follow them day and night, and in this way when the night was too dark for the man to see the bunch, his saddle horse would do the work of seeing for him. One man would follow the bunch about twelve hours, when he would be relieved by another, and thus the pursuit would continue until the creatures had reached that condition where the four of us could land them in the corral, and it was here that we put the corn-fed strength of our saddle horses to the final test. I think the mustang was the original stampeder, for every time the rider would approach them they would give that inimitable snort, which was really a kind of coarse, double-action whistle, and go on a dead run for a considerable distance, and they would continue these antics until they were no more than able to shamble along. Sometimes we would concentrate our efforts to capture some especial beauty, and after three or four days' hard labor would get him, only to find that the coveted prize was a mass of flowing mane and tail, glittering color and diminutive body. During the three months we captured twenty-eight head, most of them government mules and escaped saddle horses, the entire bunch being worth about $1,800, and as this about cleaned up that character of stock, so far as we were able to ascertain, we abandoned the mythical mustang beauty business to engage in more lucrative pursuits, for there was no considerable remuneration in capturing the escaped saddle horses and work mules, and none at all in fooling with mustangs.

"While buffalo hunting in the Double Mountain country in 1876. I selected a location for a cattle ranch, and in June, 1879, I went to San Saba county, and got a herd of 1,200 cattle, which were placed on the ranch previously selected. I was just east of the Plains, and not far from the north line of what is now Borden county, but we knew nothing about county boundaries at that time. There was not a ranch west of me, but twenty-five miles north was the Lan C ranch, and several miles east of that was the Curry Comb ranch, both of which, I think, were established in the latter part of 1878, while several miles north of the Curry Comb ranch J. B. and W. B. Slaughter had a big ranch, and Clay Mann, G. K. Elkins and Uncle Smoky Brown were soon located some distance east of my ranch. In 1879 the 22 outfit established their ranch in the southeast corner of Crosby county, and George Womack established the Diamond Cross ranch near the center of the present county lines of Kent and Garza counties in the same year. In the early part of 1880 John Beal established the Buckle B ranch on the Colorado river, in the southern part of Borden county, Willis Holloway located at the springs on Bull Creek, and John Powers established the J. Buckle ranch on the Double Mountain Fork, about thirty-five miles east of my place. Doak Good was hid among the recesses of the Yellow House Canyon, and the Nunn Brothers had a big ranch in Scurry county, I think. In all that country west of Fisher and lying between the present Texas & Pacific and the Fort Worth & Denver railroads there might have been a few more ranches other than those mentioned, but if so I do not recall them at present. After 1880, however, ranches began to multiply very rapidly, and it was only about three years until the whole western country was overstocked.

"I suppose Doak Good was the first man to locate a ranch as far west as the foot of the plains, and in what year he located his little ranch in the Yellow House Canyon I do not know, but it was probably in the early part

"As late as 1879 there were still a considerable number of buffaloes in the country, but not enough to justify buffalo hunters killing them for profit, for they were in small bunches, very wild, and scattered over a vast territory. In those days the cowman's principal occupation was line riding, that is, riding around the boundaries of his range, in order to keep his cattle within their proper limits, and to keep the buffaloes out, for domestic cattle would frequently fall in with a bunch of them and drift away. Indians caused considerable annoyance in my section of country in 1879, stealing horses, but no clashes of any consequence occurred between them and the whites. Game of all kinds was abundant, but the only instance in this connection which I deem worthy of any attention at present was the departure of the gray wolves from my section of country in 1880.

"Early one morning about the middle of February I was riding along the edge of the Plains a short distance from the cap rock when I saw a long string of objects coming out of the canyon and heading in a northwesterly course across the Plains. Anxious to see what it was, I hurried along and soon got close to see, to my astonishment, that they were gray wolves. It was of course, impossible to ascertain the number with any degree of accuracy, but there must have been several thousand of them. They were perhaps twenty abreast, were strung along for a distance of two or three miles, and were traveling in a sweeping trot. I rode up to within a few yards and began shooting into them with my pistol, but this created no constermation in their ranks, nor did they do as hungry wolves are supposed to always do-stop and devour such as were killed or crippled, for I know I killed two, and might have crippled several. While I was shooting they veered from me a short distance, forming a kind MARKET MARKET AND THE TOTAL TO THE of semi-circle, but the line was never broken nor the gait they were traveling changed. On the same day other parties saw what was evidently the same pack crossing the Yellow House, still traveling in a sweeping trot and headed northwest. It is hardly reasonable to suppose that any considerable portion of these wolves came from any particular section of country, many of them having probably come from the country a hundred or so miles south. If similar bands were ever seen leaving the country, I never heard of it, but I do not remember having seen a gray wolf in this country after that year, until they began drifting back, presumably from Indian Territory and the mountain regions, in 1885. There were probably a few of them here and there at all times, but I did not see them nor hear of any mischief they had done. Whether these wolves were following the buffaloes, or were governed and directed by some instinct of another kind, is an inscrutable mystery to me. It is a well-known fact that squirrels and a few other animals not classed as migratory animals do migrate in large bodies, but the gray wolf prefers to sneak around alone or with a small, select crowd, usually his own family, and I suppose this is the first instance where they were known to migrate in a large, harmonious body.

"The first herd of cattle I ever saw passing through that part of the country to cross the plains was the D Z herd, owned by Mim Newman, and in charge of Joe Stokes. This was in the early part of 1880, and the cattle were being driven to Running Water, in the northwestern part of the plains. Many heards passed through that section of country going into Kansas, but this is the first herd of which I have any personal knowledge crossing the plains.

"In 1882 the buffaloes entirely disappeared from Western Texas, and during that year several big herds of cattle were moved into my section of country and all land on which there was any water was held by some one as a 'range right.' Several more big outfits crowded into the country during 1883 and 1884, and by the winter of 1884 the range was badly crowded and the grass so eaten and trampled, especially along the water courses, that the first big die-up occurred on the range in that portion of Western Texas.

"Some of the toughest characters ever known have at some time or another lived or rendezvoused in Western Texas. We find them harassing the buffalo hunters and they keep us company down to a somewhat recent date, but always operating in some section of country or particular community where there was no law or where they were shielded from its effect.

"The first outlaws to invade the extreme western portion of the State were from New Mexico, but the buffalo hunters were followed by professional horse thieves, who would steal horses and mules and drive them into Kansas, where they found a ready and profitable market. Horse stealing was regarded by the old-timer as the most heinous and excuseless of crimes, and death was the penalty inexorably fixed. In those days horses were scarce and valuable, average serviceable animals being worth from $100 to $150, and losing them subjected the owner to great loss and inconvenience. Such a loss put a stop to the operations of the buffalo hunter until his horses or mules could be recovered or replaced, and might easily mean the loss of an entire hunting season. Such loss left the buffalo hunter afoot, probably miles from any other camp, and at the mercy of the Indians and circumstances. Horse stealing affected the buffalo hunter but little, if any, more seriously than it did the cowman, for horses were an absolute necessity in conducting a cow ranch. There was no law to give protection, and drastic treatment was the frontierman's only effective remedy.

"All things considered, death for horse theft was a very humane punishment at that time.

"But toughs of the toughest kind were found around the frontier towns and embraced every kind from the tin-horn gambler, sneak thief, robber and pickpockets to the professional gambler and expert killer. This class of citizenship was a considerable and, in many cases, predominating element in every town that flourished during the 'palmy days in the West.' First such toughs were around the government posts, then the buffalo hunters' supply camps, and during the cattle boom era, from 1882 to 1885, every town in Western Texas was to a greater or less extent afflicted with this undesirable element. In most of the Western towns everything was 'wide open,' and one that could not number among its business institutions all kinds of gambling, a dance hall or two, and from one to two or three dozen saloons were considered a 'bum burg.'

"The character of a cow outfit generally corresponded with the character of the party for whom the outfit worked. A good man generally employed good men, while a hard citizen always employed men who would best serve his evil purposes. Some of the most noted cattle 'barons' were nothing more than a lot of prosperous thieves, and always kept a bunch of scoundrels around them. Of course, good men would sometimes be found working for a tough outfit, and a tough man sometimes working for an honorable gentleman, but in either instance the arrangement was temporary and resulted from necessity. All was not love among the oldtime cowmen, for there was a great deal of friction, a great many conflicts, most of which came up over grass and water, but the festive maverick was a potent factor. Whenever a fellow got so expert hoggish that he could steal more cattle and spread around over more country that didn't belong to anybody than all of his neighbors could, he was apt to become unpopular. Cattle stealing was a sort of common custom, and so long as everybody did equally well at it there was peace and prosperity, but whenever some strenuous individual began to monopolize and concentrate this lucrative feature of the cattle business into his own hands there was certain to be a great complaint throughout the land, and the first thing he knew a reform group would be holding an indignation meeting not far from his headquarters. At first self-preservation and plenty of room made friends of all, but when the common enemy had been exterminated and the cowmen began to get in each other's way, there were the natural results of competition.

No attempt was made to establish ranches on the Llano Estacado, or Staked Plains, until after the general introduction of wire fences, which was about 1883, and there was no extensive effort to establish ranches on the plains until it was accidentally discovered that water was to be obtained there at very shallow depths and that earthen tanks could be made to hold water better than any other kind or reservoirs.

Next to solving the water question on the plains, the discovery of the fact that milo maize and kaffir corn were especially adapted to that high altitude and dry climate has been the most important factor in bringing that part office 236 of the country to a high state of utility.

BIRTH AND COLLAPSE OF THE GREAT CATTLE BOOM

The great cattle boom, which began in 1882 and collapsed in 1896, has never been surpassed in any line of business nor in any section of country, but it is needless to devote any considerable amount of space to considering the cause of the boom nor the result of the crash that followed. It was in the days of railroad building, town booms, agricultural El Dorados and live stock fanaticism. The advance in the price of cattle in 1881 was in probability due to natural legitimate trade demands, but the balloonlike accension of prices that followed was only a boom, and like all booms, took more for toll than it had received for grinding. The whole West was in the throes of a wild financial debauch—a revel of sorrow-breeding indiscretion—and the mirage of plenty lured the rainbow chasers into the desert of death. Elated by the intoxicating influence of fickle prosperity men dallied with the voluptuous follies of the present and never gave one sane thought to the future, and only awoke to a realization of their errors when the earthquake of adversity opened chasms into which their hopes and fortunes tumbled.

The very condition of things at the beginning of the great cattle boom was calculated to produce spasms of enthusiasms that would dwarf men's business judgment. For years the country had been flooded with fabulous, dime-novel stories of the great cattle industry of Texas and of the waiting resources and unutilized opportunities, and when trunk line railroads were constructed through the hitherto uninhabited sections of the West, giving direct connections with the outside world and affording means by which persons of refinement, having plenty of money and accustomed to lives of ease, could make pleasure jaunts into the land of grass, sunshine, cows and vastness and inspect for themselves the country about which they had heard so much, they came, saw, marveled and thought they understood, but they didn't. These men came attended by all the conveniences and comforts wealth could afford. They made long excursions through the cattle country, and into the "Far West," where as yet no man claimed the land and no cattle grazed upon the commons. Rains had been abundant. The lakes were full of water, the hillsides decked in flowers, while in the vegas, along the arroyas, on the prairies, plains and platears, the green downy mesquite grass waved like fields of knee-high wheat. It was magnificent! Such glorious isolation; such boundless possibilities. Men with no practical knowledge of the cattle business, though practical business men in their proper spheres, became entranced with the illusive picture and were soon the pioneers in the wildest boom the cattle business has ever known. Enthusiasm spread and soon the whole country was delirious with the fever of the cattle boom. Inexperienced men paid fabulous prices for herds of cattle, "range delivery," and simply supposed themselves owners of so many hundreds or thousands of cattle. They paid great sums of money for range privileges to which they received not a shadow of title and could only hold so long as some one else did not choose to appropriate a portion thereof, and as the boom continued the ranches increased, the herds became more numerous, range rights became more precarious and grass and water

The excitement once started, the old-time cowmen proceeded to speculate with a recklessness that knew no DELIVERED TWICE DAILY bounds, and while a few of them "got from under," hundreds of them were the greatest sufferers by reason of the collapse. English syndicates, as well as American companies and rich individuals, made cattle and range investments representing millions of dollars, and while they lived in their luxurious homes hundreds or thousands of miles from their ranches, their cattle interests were often entrusted to men of limited business ability and little if any practical experience. That is, this was the case in most instances, for in those days it was almost impossible to employ a reliable, experienced cowman for the reason that most of them were operating for themselves, though after the boom many of the best cowmen were glad to get jobs as managers for others. These big cattlemen would visit their ranches probably once a year, or in the case of a syndicate or big company send representatives. In either case the visit would be more of a display of splendor or pageant across the plains than a business trip for purposes of inspection and regulation.

EDITORIAL COMMENT: Two weeks ago this reporter went to Baird, and were we surprised! We found that center parking and all its hazards had been removed, and still there was plenty of parking space for county people to stop their cars and do their shopping easily. Heretofore, it has been quite embarassing to have the grocery boy carry groceries half way home on foot, but the new plan Baird has for parking is surely a credit to the town and a convenience to the folks who go to town to trade. Run Off Roaches, Says Dr. Cox

AUSTIN - A dime store paint brush and a few ounces of chlordane are the only tools you need to run off those pesky roaches, State Health Officer Geo. W. Cox advises.

But he says keeping them off is a bigger job.

Roaches are disease carriers from way back, the health officer pointed out. They've been found naturally infected with polio virus. And that alone is reason enough to declare war against the filth ridden pests. Here's the way to do it:

First: get a 2 per cent chlordane spray and a two-bit paint Mrs. Will St. John of Dallas brush from the drug store. Then ted the 4th for medical treat- was a week end guest in the take all the pots, pans, and home of Mr. and Mrs. Fred dishes from the kitchen cabinet and wash them in soapy water.

Take off the motor panel of the refrigerator, and treat the floor and corners of the motor compartment. Paint the walls behind the refrigerator, because roaches will hide any place they can find protection. Be sure to paint around bathroom pipes.

In older houses it's possible that roaches will be hiding in cracks between the wall boards and door and window frames. So don't pass up a crack because it looks too small to harbor roaches. The young insects are mighty small

After the spray in the cabinets has dried thoroughly, cover the shelves where dishes and food are stored with paper.

You can get a can of caulking compound for just a few cents, which makes filling cracks permanently an inexpensive process. But run some of the spray into cracks before sealing them up. This will kill ants, too. Blaine are spending the week in

All this will help you get rid of roaches, Dr. Cox emphasizes. But if you leave food exposed, they'll soon be back at the same old stand.

Hot and Heavy Campaign Predicted As Ike and Adlai Vie for Presidency

By the time the Democratic convention screeched to a halt in Chicago on July 26 America had the line-ups for what is shaping up to be one of the most crucial presidential elections in the nation's history.

To compete with Republicans Dwight D. Eisenhower and Richard Nixon for the presidential prize the Democrats picked Gov. Adlai Stevenson of Illinois and In this respect he is in a certain Sen. Ever since the opening of the big quadrennial meeting on Monday. July 21, the 1,230 Democratic delegates inhabiting the swarming floor of Chicago's International Amphitheatre had fought like the Kilkenny cats over civil rights, candidates, party loyalty, and a few other less profound issues-such as whether or not to adjourn.

date Disregarded Implications

It is a fair assumption, however, that the Democrats this year had their eyes open to this fact and knew what they were doing, choosing to ignore the possible implications in favor of nominating a vice-presidential candidate who would achieve within the party the North-South unity they need and want so badly.

One thing seems certain at this juncture: the presidential cam-paign will be a hard-fought battle and the election will be extremely

The Democrats, however, have an edge over the Republicans in that the integral structure of their party organization has not been so severely damaged. The Republican Old Guard, represented by the defeated Taft forces, remains bitter over Eisenhower's nomination and has not yet been seen jumping over any fences to give its full support to the GOP nominees.

Although the Democratic convention was a furious political melee, the party succeeded in maintaining a working cohesion, which was at least partly the result of Sen. Estes Kefauver's graceful acceptance of his defeat.

Kefauver, who started out the convention with the most popular support and the greatest number of delegates known to be pledged to any of the candidates, played the role of the stag at bay during the whole proceedings. He was besieged at every turn by a growing force of Stevenson, and in the final analysis could not cope with the tremendous influence wielded by the Illinois and New York delega-

TB and the X-Ray Bus

Time was when the TB victim innocently walked the streets of his town undetected—and undetectable.

For who had the millionaire's pocketbook to pay for examining a whole town of a thousand people to sieve out one possible victim?

Now comes the x-ray bus, able to be TB detective for whole cities, for a few pennies a person. Millions of people now have their TB worries erased when the doctor says "Okay."

How long did it take to get the x-ray bus? Well, for its part, General Electric had been working on x rays for 57 years. Costs of diagnosis have come down by better and better equipment. No year passes without some new development. So this was another big chapter in a long book of events.

Notice the nice way these buses get into service. They are usually purchased by voluntary contributions of plain people trying to get a job done.

It is always hard to write a definition of the "American Way." But this hand-in-hand achievement of state and national health associations, General Electric, and the local communities comes close to being a perfect example.
