Know Your Law ---

The history of liberty often shows that a would-be tyrant likes to accuse his opponents of treason. So, to safeguard our liberty the constitution itself sets out the kind of proof we need to find some one guilty of treason.

For this reason America has had relatively few cases of treason. Not so in early English and Roman law. 'Treasonous acts" covered many things, in fact, anything that seemed to threaten the community safe-

In the fourteenth century the English tried to define treason: Since every subject owed allegiance to the King, trivial breaches of a private nature became "petite (small) treuson." But a subject disloyal enough as to attack or plot against the king himself was guilty of "high". self was guilty of "high" treason

The kings liked this: For one to imagine the king's death became treason subject to death.

The broadened treason widened futher to include crimes against private persons. Later even the king himself was not exempted: In 1649 they indicted, convicted, and beheaded King Charles I for King Henry VIII made it high treason to slaughter Queen Anne or her children. Failure to take an oath not to slaughter the queen it-

Under Elizabeth I it became treason for anyone to hold a religion which did not conform to the Conviction of treason was easy In some cases you needed no witnesses. Trials were short and the accused could not have defense

In conflicts for power, the losing politicians often became "traitors" as they do in many countries to this day. Our early settlers lived in troubled times with the coming revolution creating new factions. For them treason was also a frequent accusation.

But after the revolution the founding fathers and the people had They decided to limit "treason" and faced these prolems: Should the new executive put down rebel-lious and define treasons himself? Should the Congress during "troub led times" have power to define treason?

No. The new Constitution cook treason out of politics. It said trea-son "shall consist only of levying war against the United States or in giving aid and comfort to the enemy."
