From Cattle Range to Cotton Patch

By DON H. BIGGERS

The first night after leaving his companions Benson's horse got away from him in some manner. Already feverish and partially delirious from thirst, the awfullest suffering known in the category of human misery, he must then make his way on foot across several miles of barren, sun-parched country before reaching the spring. In relating his experience Benson said he knew about how far it was to water and about how long it would take him to travel the distance, and that he formed a determination to reach his destination, to not give up or despond and to make sure of this to not stop to rest until the spring had been reached; to try to forget his sufferings, or at least not fully realize them by anticipating the certain relief awaiting him. As the sun rose higher and the heat became more torturing, beautiful lakes spread out upon the prairies before him, but he knew their deceptive glamor—they were only mirages. As the heat increased his thirst became more painful and his fever raged more fiercely, the beautiful lakes became more numerous, apparently dancing in mockery at his feet. At times he felt as though he was walking backwards or staggering in a direction contrary to that he wished to go, or reeling to fall, choked by his own tongue. Again it seemed that the light was fading away and that he was being consumed from without and within by an unseen fire; but he must not give up, for it was only a few miles farther, only a few hours more. Not even a wild animal ranged in that desert, but from out the dismal solitude came a medley of sounds which incessantly tingled in his ears. At last he reached the outskirts of the canyon, and it was only a few yards to the water, but the path was rough and he must move cautiously, and having become accustomed to mechanically treading over the smooth surface of the plains, could he walk among the rocks and along the winding trail without stumbling? He was growing weaker and a great mountain of weight seemed pressing down upon his body, and his only motive power was his powerful will, his determination to reach that spring, and to not fall, for should he fall he could never rise beneath that awful weight; then the weight vanished and his body was so light that every gust of wind seemed to whirl him about, but the spring was near, he was slowly nearing the goal and he must not fall. As he neared the spring reason asserted itself and began to give him counsel. He must not drink, only bathe in the water and then sleep and rest, for to drink too much would be fatal and to drink at all would be dangerous, for once tasting water he might not control his craving. Repeating this warning to himself he crept along to the spring, and there it was! Not mirage, but pure, delicious water. He could see it, could hear it trickling over the stones, but it was so strange, so unnatural, yet so pleasant. Repeating to himself the warning that he must not drink, he sank upon the bank of the spring and pulled off his shoes. He then attempted to wade in the water, but fell with most of his body in the spring. Then he became desperate, furious. He would drink his fill, give his life as the price and die satisfied with the transaction, but nature had provided against his own rashness, for when he pressed the water to his mouth, his lips, tongue and throat were so swollen that he could not swallow. He bathed his face, head and hands, crawled upon the bank, pillowed his head upon a rock and with his throbbing, burning feet in the water he went to sleep. He had no idea what time of day it was when he reached the spring, nor how long he slept, but when he awoke it was night, though he knew not what hour; his feet were badly swollen and paining him, but he was rational and felt greatly relieved, took another good bath, drank a few handfuls of water and went to sleep again and did not wake up until late the next day. Then he was suffering nearly as badly from hunger as he had formerly suffered from thirst, but he knew that George Causey's outfit had been camped about two miles down the canyon and supposed he would still find someone there. His feet and legs were so swollen and sore that he could not walk, so he strapped his shoes on his back and crawled the entire distance from the spring to the camp, only to find it deserted, not even a scrap of buffalo meat on the ground. He found a little corn that had been wasted from the horse troughs, a small piece of rancid bacon, which he devoured with great relish, and some tow sacks in which he would wrap his feet. He then rested a few hours and succeeded in reaching a buffalo camp the next day.

When Benson reached the spring he had been about five days and nights without water and more than six days and nights without food when he reached the Causey camp, none of the men with the expedition having tasted food for several hours before their water was entirely consumed. Water being scarce, the discovery of more uncertain, they took only small quantities at a time, and to have eaten would have increased their thirst. I will add, as a postscript, that the Indians got away.

Jose, who was known by no other name, was doubtless the most noted scout and guide that ever operated in Western Texas, his most noted achievement being the guiding of Gen. Mackenzie to the camp of several hundred Comanche Indians, in the Tule Canyon, which resulted in their surprise and capture and subsequent slaughter of 1500 or 2000 of their horses. From the time of his capture in 1872 until the close of the Indian troubles Jose played a prominent part in the Indian history of Western Texas and Eastern New Mexico. Jose himself was an acquisition by conquest of a somewhat peculiar character. Early in the 70's Gen. Mackenzie discovered that the Western Indians were procuring large supplies of guns and ammunition from some source and he began reconnoitering to find out the secret of this undesirable state of affairs. After several months' vain effort the General became discouraged and concluded that about the only way he could keep the guns and ammunition and Indians from getting together would be to transport the whole Indian race to a region where deadly weapon distributors wouldn't venture because of the certainty of not getting back, but while the General was sojourning under a cloud of his own wrath near the line of Texas and New Mexico, a runner came from the scene of war whoops in Southern Kansas, No Man's Land and the Panhandle, bringing to the General a cordial invitation from the Secretary of War to hurry to the scene of consternation and participate as the guest of honor at the obsequies of an Indian outbreak. The General was riding in a sweeping trot and a circumspect attitude across the plains somewhere in the vicinity of the present right of way of the Pecos Valley Railroad when he came upon a train of thirty big freight-wagons. That was unusual and not expected. The General's eyes got full of interrogation points, his curiosity became aroused and the voice of duty whispered to him, saying, "Go see about it, find out to whom this outfit belongs, where it is from, where it is going, and what its business is," but when the General got within a few hundred yards of the wagons a voice from one of them commanded him to hide out. This was an embarrassing situation for the General. He was now convinced of two things—that there was something crooked about the outfit and something very straight about the way the fellow talked. The General then commanded the outfit to surrender, and the commander of the outfit sent the General a message that took the horn off of his saddle and followed this immediately by another message that would have placed the General on the retired list if his head had been a couple of inches farther south. This rudeness made the General angry and he told the party in charge of the outfit that he was no part of a gentleman. Hard feelings resulted and then there was a fight, not merely a disturbance of the peace, but a typical pioneer day disagreement. The outfit had been completely surrounded by soldiers and could not escape, and after several hours' fighting, all of them, with one exception, had been killed or so badly wounded that they could not use a gun. The General again commanded the survivor, who was evidently in command of the outfit, to surrender, but he declined, giving as a reason that he didn't want to, and wouldn't, but after considerable parleying he changed his mind and agreed to meet the General unarmed on half way grounds. After a considerable conference he surrendered his entire outfit, including twenty-five corpses and four mortally wounded Mexicans to the United States Government. The man was Jose, owner of the outfit, and for whom the dead and wounded men had been working. His wagons were loaded with guns and ammunition and his capture solved the problem as to who had been supplying the Indians with the sinews of war for several months, and also explained why he had made such a desperate resistance.

What kind of terms were made with Jose was a secret known only to him and General Mackenzie, but subsequent events caused the general impression that they were very generous. At any rate the entire outfit of teams, guns, ammunition wagons and provisions, aggregating several thousands dollars, were appropriated by the government as contraband of war and Jose entered the government service as a scout and guide, and by his subsequent faithful service more than atoned for his former mischief, for, though more than half savage himself when captured, he became the friend of the white men and never betrayed a trust.

In this connection it is perhaps not inappropriate to make further mention of Mackenzie's slaughter of the Indians' horses, which took place on the Tule, not far from the present town of Tulia, probably in 1873 or 1874, but this is said to have never been reported to the department, the General having acted upon his own initiative and responsibility, and in a manner calculated to effectively meet a dire emergency. This summary action came near getting the General, who according to the ideas of old buffalo hunters and ranchmen, was the best Indian fighter that ever operated in Texas, courtmartialled. The Indians, as already mentioned, were Comanches, and some of them had been on the reservation in the Indian Territory while others had never been captured, but had been leading a nomadic, sub-tribe, marauding life, and for several years the reservation Indians had been slipping away, joining the Indians in Western Texas, committing all kinds of depredations and returning to the reservation when it suited their pleasure, and it was against these Indians that Gen. Mackenzie inaugurated his famous campaign, which really lasted three years, beginning about 1870 and during which time he fought several battles, made the three Mackenzie trails on the northern plains and probably first traversed many others which have since taken his name. He never knew how many Indians were in the country nor what numbers he might encounter, so he always campaigned with a big force and one trip with his big train of heavy wagons was sufficient to make a trail that would remain for years, and those he traveled frequently now looked like great plowed furrows across the prairies.

When Jose guided Mackenzie to the Indian camp in the Tule Canyon they were so surprised on finding themselves completely surrounded that they made but a feeble resistance. The capture was made near where the town of Claude, in Armstrong county, now stands, but the Indians were at once moved several miles west. The place where the Indians were put under guard where the horses were killed is one of the most picturesque places in Western Texas. On either side of Tule Creek, a little stream of crystal water fed by perennial springs, its banks lined with willows, hackberries and other small timber, for a distance of three or four miles there is an impassable bluff from fifty to two or three hundred yards to half a mile wide, and by turning the Indians into this valley and placing a strong guard above and below them they were completely imprisoned.

The Baird Star, Baird, Callahan County, Texas, July 4, 1952

MODERN IMPROVEMENTS

The Baird Star has been replacing old equipment with new and modern machines ever since we purchased the business nearly eight years ago. This constant effort has gradually transformed the Baird print shop into an up-to-date printery where speed and efficiency in producing modern printed forms is an every day feature. While any kind of letter press printing can be done, we are specializing in business ruled forms.

Today the Baird printing shop is equipped with latest types of equipment and can hold its own in this age of keen competition. Today we are installing a new Hammond Glider Saw, a precision tool to increase the accuracy of type forms. With the Hammond Glider our commercial printing department takes its place among the most efficient printing shops of the state. Only recently an Eva Press, equipment for manufacturing rubber printing plates was installed. No town the size of Baird that we know about has a print shop equipped with an Eva Press. This equipment enables The Star to produce the finest business forms possible and then to reproduce the forms over and over in a minimum of time with highest efficiency. The rubber plate system is being used to reprint a number of books that have long been out of print. Among these books is the story that is now appearing weekly in The Star entitled, "From Cattle Range to Cotton Patch." With such equipment as a Model 31 Linotype, Hammond Glider Saw, Hammond Easy Kaster, Little Giant automatic printing press, Challenge paper drill, and other modern accessories, The Star printing shop is one in which all Baird and Callahan county people can take real pride.

WE LIKE JOHN BEN

Few have prepared themselves for a successful political life as well as has John Ben Shepperd, former state president of the Jaycees and for a long while Secretary of State to Governor Allan Shivers.

Now John Ben Shepperd asks the people of Texas for his first elective office—that of attorney general.

We believe he should be named to this office. We believe he will be named to this office, despite a last-minute filing by two lesser known individuals.

Shepperd has long kept his political fences in good repair. He is widely known as a speaker, has a good educational background, a most pleasant personality, a fine family, and above all has a burning ambition to go places as a public servant.

The Star commends his candidacy, with the belief that when he is elected he will fill that office in the same efficient manner displayed by his retiring predecessor and many other great Texans who first came into prominence in that post.

Mrs. B. C. Stewart and children, Sandra, Bernie and Jerry, of Ft. Worth, returned to their home Monday after visiting Mrs. Stewart's mother, Mrs. Eula Walker, for two weeks.

Recent visitors in the home of Mr. and Mrs. Floyd Collins and Vernon Avery, were Mrs. W. H. Mills and son, Leo; Mrs. Irene Mobley and son, Jimmy, formerly of Baird, now of Corsicana; Mrs. J. B. Waldrop and son, Joe, and Billie Ruth Ellis, of Euless.

WAS $6.25

NOW $1.37

It's getting to be a rare day when you see a real, genuine bargain advertised. In these days of planned economy everything seems to be included in the plans except economy.

But we have here an honest-to-Pete bargain to tell you about. It's a bargain because it's much more useful than it once was, and costs much less than it used to.

It's the television set.

In 1948 our 10-inch screen set cost $6.25 per square inch of picture. Today, our 20-inch set costs only about $1.37 per square inch, and gives you a much finer picture almost four times the size.

So, you see, with all the forces of inflation, a counterforce has been quietly at work. Research and engineering are steadily plugging along—improving products—making them do more, cost less, and last longer.

At least, that's the way it is at General Electric.

Sure, it's smart to look at the price tag. But it's also smart to look beyond . . . to the performance of the product and the name of the maker. The best possible products at the lowest possible prices—that's G.E.'s idea of good business.

You can put your confidence in.
