ale, or to BARCLAY and PERKINS'S brown stout, which, by the way, may also be an opinion of Mr. C. BULLER...

It will, doubtless, be in the recollection of our readers, that in the latter end of last March a debate took place in the House of Commons...

"I think," he said, "that I ought in general to attend to the recommendations of the Town Councils..."

The Moniteur of Sunday gives the following intelligence from Spain, which, however, is but a repetition of the accounts we had previously received...

The Duke of Sussex.—The bulletin of yesterday morning contains to afford hope that his Royal Highness will shortly be restored to health...

Next, as to the comparative merits of the two propositions, Mr. Rice had said that the soap duty was an increasing duty, and the newspaper duty a decreasing duty...

At a time when the present Government are urging the House of Lords to pass the Irish Municipal Bill, on the plea of doing "justice to Ireland..."

We are led to make these remarks in consequence of our having had forwarded to us a West Devon paper, containing a correspondence between certain Conservative members of the Town Council of Plymouth...

Again, continued Mr. GOULBURN, Mr. Rice had said, that there had already been relief given to the soap duty, but that no relief had been extended to newspapers...

These circumstances were further communicated to the Home Secretary: nevertheless, at the end of about six weeks, the applicants were laconically informed that "Lord JOHN RUSSELL did not propose at the present time to recommend any addition to the number of justices for the borough of Plymouth..."

There were several other speeches delivered which we should be glad to notice, but that we have neither time nor room to-day. Some of the curiosities of the discussion, however, are too good to be passed over in silence...

children of ten, nine, and even eight years of age, were at present worked for more than ten hours of the day. Mr. HUME, after presenting some petitions from certain paper-manufacturers, gave notice that, in furtherance of the prayer of their petitions, he should, when the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER proposed to reduce the duties on stained paper, submit a motion that the drawback be allowed upon the stock in hand...

Previous to the discussion on the Stamp Duties, the following conversation took place:—"Mr. G. PRICE asked the noble Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether this country was at war with one of the belligerent parties now in Spain?"

The discussion upon the question whether the duty on soap or the duty on newspapers shall be reduced, occupied the House of Commons last night. Mr. Rice having moved that the House resolve itself into committee on the Stamp and Excise Acts, moved a resolution to the effect, that it is expedient that the duty on newspapers be reduced from 4d. to 1d., subject to whatever regulations as to size and double sheets may hereafter be enacted...

Mr. Rice moved the amendment upon several grounds. In the first place, he said the soap duty was an increasing duty, and the duty on newspapers a diminishing duty, and therefore, on financial grounds, he ought to select the latter for reduction. The quantity of hard soap brought to charge in 1831 was 109,000,000 pounds, and in 1835 it was 135,000,000 pounds, and in 1835 it was 12,103,000 pounds; whereas in 1831 the stamp duty on newspapers was 485,000, and in 1835 it had fallen to 455,000. In the next place, the soap duty had already been reduced, whereas the duty on newspapers had not. So recently as 1834, Lord ALTHORP had reduced the soap duty one-half. He thought, therefore, that he ought to give relief where it had not been given before, instead of giving more relief where relief had already been given. So far from believing that increased consumption would make up for the deficiency created by the reduction proposed by Sir C. KNIGHTLEY, he thought he could demonstrate that the deficiency created by that reduction could not possibly be made up by increased consumption...

Having thus showed his disinclination for the diffusion of soap, Mr. Rice proceeded to consider the merits of his own proposition relative to the stamp duties on newspapers. He desired to know how it was that paper education was more courted than ever, and the thirst for knowledge more ardent than at any preceding time, the stamp duty on newspapers was found to be a diminishing duty? It must be because the duty was too high—that it was far beyond the legitimate amount, and that, consequently, in this, as in every other similar case, an illicit trade had grown up. The temptation to the smuggler was so great, that the smuggling could not be put an end to without removing the temptation. It was said, that by going to the coffee-house, or to the publican's, people could read the papers for nothing; but he desired to take the papers to the cottages of the labourers,—to the houses of the mechanics, and so keep them away from public-houses. Mr. Rice then proceeded to give a very detailed account of the extent to which he and his colleagues have allowed the law to be violated by the unstamped press, and, taking advantage of his own wrong, argued that this illicit trade (for which nobody but Ministers themselves are to blame) demonstrates the necessity of reducing the duty.

Mr. GOULBURN replied to Mr. Rice, observing that, for the present, he would confine himself to the consideration of the simple question, whether the soap duty or the stamp duty should be reduced. Mr. Rice had said that the revenue would bear the reduction of the latter, but not the reduction of the former, because it was impossible that any increase of consumption of soap could make up the deficiency caused by the reduction of the duty. But the Excise Commissioners were of a contrary opinion; their reports were directly at variance with this assertion of the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. Mr. Rice had shown that there had been but a small increase in the consumption of soap, notwithstanding the reduction of the duty one-half; but what was the cause of this? Why, that the duty had not been reduced low enough. He thought he could demonstrate this. The fact was, that there had been an increase of consumption in soap since the reduction of the duty; but where? Why, in the rural districts only, and there only because the illicit trader did not prosecute his calling in such places. In London there had been a decrease of half a million of pounds—namely, from 32,900,000, to 32,400,000. In Scotland the decrease had been still greater. It amounted to little short of one million of pounds. It was clear, therefore, that in the soap trade the smuggler was still at work, and that, by Mr. Rice's own showing, he ought to reduce the duty on soap, in order to put an end to the illicit trade.

Mr. G. PRICE asked the noble Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether this country was at war with one of the belligerent parties now in Spain? and if it was, so, either under the name of co-operation, intervention, or non-intervention (hear, hear), whether any cartel had been arranged for the exchange of prisoners, in case His Majesty's troops should be "unfortunately among the number?"

Mr. G. PRICE.—That is no answer to my question. My question was this—Has there been any arrangement for an exchange of prisoners, in case any of His Majesty's troops should have the misfortune to fall into the hands of one of the belligerent parties?

Mr. POULETT THOMSON then moved the committee of the whole house on the Stamp and Excise Acts. Sir R. PEEL took that opportunity of inquiring the course the Government mean to pursue with respect to the Irish tithe bill. That measure stood on the paper for Friday next, and it would be extremely convenient to both sides of the house, if the noble Lord opposite would state the course he intended to follow in this matter. Lord JOHN RUSSELL said that his intention was to proceed with that bill on Friday evening. On Friday next he certainly should bring on the question of English tithes. The motion was then agreed to, and the bill went through committee.

On the motion of Mr. Alderman WOOD, the Public Carriages (Metropolis) Bill (after a short desultory conversation) went through committee, and the report was ordered to be received to-morrow (this day).

On the motion of Mr. O'LOUGHLIN, the Chapels of Ease (Ireland) Bill was committed.

Mr. FOX MAULE moved for leave to bring in a bill to place the horse patrol, at present under the management of the chief magistrates at Bow-street, under the authority of the commissioners of the metropolitan police. The hon. member stated that the measure had been recommended by a committee of the house, and the bill merely carried out the report of the committee.

Leave was given, and the hon. member brought in the bill. Mr. BROTHERTON moved the other orders of the day which were disposed of, and the house adjourned at a quarter past 12 o'clock.
