The Mall

Times Series Looks at the New Main Street: How it Fits in Our City, Our Selves and Why

Are the South Plains Mall and the Civic Center cross town rivals or are they actually carrying on a long-distance love affair?

Examining the two facilities, you can find situations suggesting the two compete. Examine again, it appears the facilities are entirely different.

Both provide entertainment. The mall offers trade, art and sports shows. But so does the Civic Center.

While the attractions are the same, the means for attracting crowds are different. The mall uses entertainment to attract shoppers to buy, not so much the tradesman's goods, but the goods of its tenant stores. The Civic Center uses entertainment to attract people interested in buying what the trade show has to sell.

While there seems to be some similarities between the two, Mickey Yerger, executive director of the Civic Center, explained that the two cannot be compared. "The Civic Center is a public facility while the mall is privately owned."

On the other hand, general manager for the South Plains Mall, Richard Colby said he sees both facilities as entertainment centers, with a bit of qualification. "It's unlikely that the Civic Center will take away the entertainment at the mall."

If you're just out to see a trade show, you'll probably find basically the same things at both places. The main difference is at the mall, what you see is free. At the Civic Center you pay an admission price, you'll probably get to see more of what you came to see and you'll have a chance at a door prize.

If you're the tradeshow dealer, the differences are more obvious.

"When people come to the Civic Center to look at a trade show, they're likely to get a better deal because the dealer knows they are there to buy," Yerger argued. Dealers can expect to see less people than they would at the mall — but the ones they do see are more likely to buy.

While there is a small admission charge for trade shows, that charge is agreed upon by the dealers that sponsor the show, said Yerger. The dealer pays rent for the Civic Center and that in turn is passed to the Civic Center visitor.

At the mall, the dealer pays only to defray advertising costs. The relatively small cost allows dealers to sell products on the mall. "There is no cost to the dealer for air conditioning and maintaining the mall area, because we have to do it anyway," said Colby.

It costs the consumer nothing and for the tradesman there is wide exposure. On a weekend the mall attracts approximately 200,000 people while the Civic Center has drawn 100,000 people during the two months it has been open.

EMS, Hospital Not On Same Wavelength

Lubbock County Hospital District Officials are chafing at Methodist Hospital's reluctance to work in a two-way communication system between LCHD ambulances and the Methodist Emergency Room.

But George Brewer, administrator of the private hospital says that such a system could leave the Hospital prey to staggering lawsuits.

The two-way radio link between ambulances and emergency rooms is part of a new communication package for the district-owned Emergency Medical System ambulances. St. Mary's hospital will implement two-way link-up in about 60 days, EMS administrator Stuart Haggard said.

LCHD higher-ups say that Methodist's reluctance has nothing to do with ambulance service or legal problems—they suggest that Methodist is biding its time to see "who will run the district" after the LCHD Board of Managers tentatively hired a outside management firm to run the district's financially-frustrated teaching hospital, being built in conjunction with the Texas Med School.

"That has nothing to do with it," Brewer said. The hospital administrator said that legal objections to the system were raised as early as last fall, in a meeting with then-LCHD executive director Harold Coston, who resigned under fire in February of this year.

"We told (Coston) the problems with a private hospital involving itself in legal liability by instructing ambulance drivers and attendants in the care of patients," Brewer said.

Brewer said that the two-way link takes on "heroic" proportions when considered in light of a television program called "Emergency"—which, interestingly enough, often crops up in LCHD discussion of the communications system.

But he distinguished the legal realities and the television fiction. "There you have residents and interns and trained paramedics working for a public hospital to answer questions and advice."

As a private hospital, Methodist would be more prey to liability for instructions radioed to EMS attendants—whether the instructions were erroneous or were erroneously carried out, Brewer argued.

"We do not have any control over EMS," the administrator declared, "We're not going to jump into this, no matter how heroic it may sound."

Privately, LCHD officials are concerned that Methodist—the city's largest hospital and the hospital that handles a great number of the very critical head injuries—may be dragging its feet, and hope that public reaction will push the private hospital to join the system.

The officials point to Methodist's Poison Control Center which allows the public to phone in for antidotes to poisons.

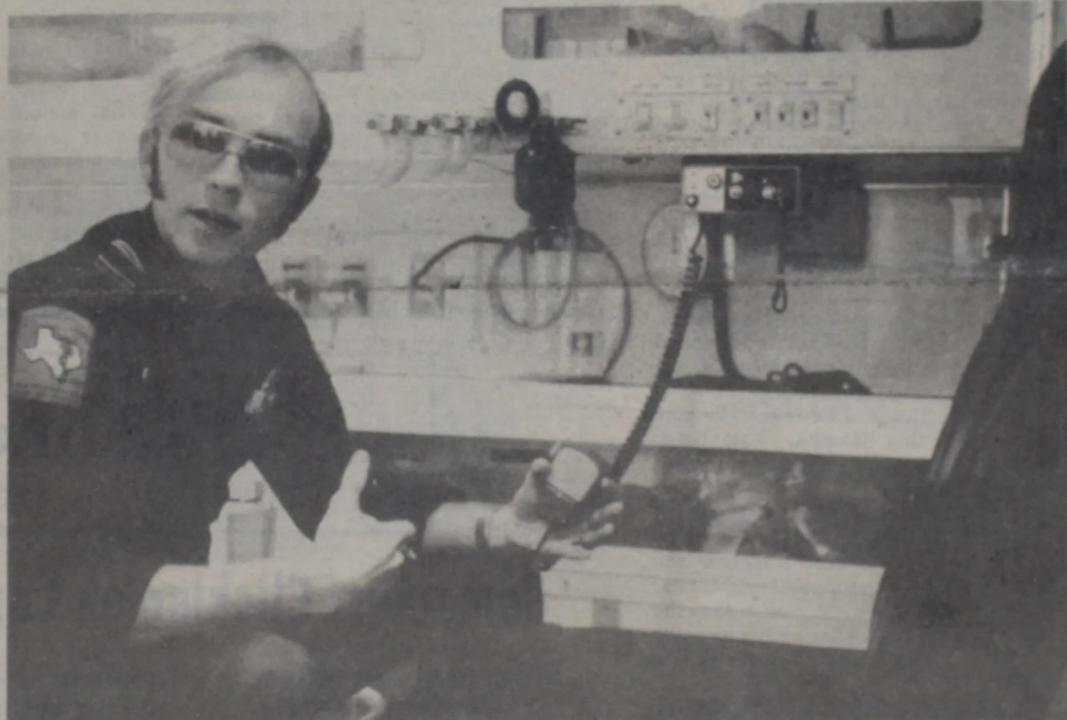

"That has been approved by the Lubbock-Crosby-Garza County Medical Society," Brewer distinguished, "It is a reading service, not an advisory service."

Brewer said that the topic of emergency room-to-ambulance communication would probably be discussed at a Methodist board of Directors meeting later this month, but declined to speculate whether any decision might be reached.

Until then, the hospital is studying the law and "will not change its direction or course," Brewer said. He did note that Methodist's financial contribution is not a major consideration, as previously published elsewhere.

We could raise the $5,000. That's no problem," Brewer said,

Research Near Completion Studies Could Pull the Plug on Carter Plan

BY CLIFF AVERY
Staff Writer

Mike Chovanec is walking across campus, muttering to himself.

He holds a copy of Federal Power Commission rulings he has checked out of the regional collection at the Tech library. They are not up to date, and like all third-year law students, like even lowly first-year law students, Chovanec knows the importance of up-to-date law.

Chovanec, a handy man with a pool cue and who has been known to lift a few waiting his turn at the table, knows he may have to seek current rulings elsewhere, because his report is not just for a class paper—it's for the governor.

Texas Gov. Dolph Briscoe, an ardent foe of President Carter's energy policy, requested reports on the presidential plan from the four major State universities—Texas Tech, the University of Texas, Texas A&M and the University of Houston.

"If any of these statements I've been making are inaccurate, I want to know about it," Briscoe told a press conference this week, as he dedicated building for Texas Tech's med school.

Briscoe said he wanted to utilize "The talent and brains" the academicians have to analyze the energy policy, particularly the controversial provisions regarding federal allocation of intrastate gas—natural gas produced in Texas for consumption in Texas, but which the Carter energy plans wants to put under federal authority.

He requested the presidents of the four universities order research into the plan as they see fit. Twenty Texas Tech professors were asked to participate in the project and have completed their preliminary draft.

The draft has been sent to the Governor's Energy Advisory Council, according to George Meenaghan, Tech dean or research, and is expected to be printed next week.

"It's in the process of finishing up," Meenaghan said of the general research, but he noted that Prof. Richard Hemingway at the law school, with whom Chovanec and other law students are working, is expected to complete his paper early next week.

Research into energy law raised the possibility that Briscoe may try a court suit to stop implementation of what he considers anti-Texas portions of the president's plan. Briscoe, who said that copies of all research are being sent to the Texas delegation in Washington, refused to rule out a suit over the energy plan.

"I'm not going to rule out anything that we might have to do," the governor, who is expected to seek a third term in 1978, said.

OPINION

Teacups and Tumbleweeds

Okay, you're going to have to decide whether Channel 13 news star Kay Stella gets a TEACUP or a TUMBLEWEED.

Here's the deal: Lubbock County Hospital District Board of Managers meets Monday, right? There's kind of a prankish air about the whole thing, because the managers are relieved to get a new permanent administrator. The district is building a teaching hospital, you might remember, and it's already in terrible financial shape, even though it's not even open. Last February, executive director Harold Coston resigned in this very tense situation—charges, countercharges, you name it. Very bad time for the hospital district.

But with new executive director Gerald Bosworth on hand, the managers are in light-hearted, even self-effacing mood. Board Chairman J.C. Rickman says some people have compared Bosworth's taking the job to signing on as captain of the Titanic, but Bosworth will make a "heck of a good captain." Rickman gets a TEACUP for a classic line: "I can't think of anybody we'd rather go down with."

After the meeting, the press adjourns with Bosworth to an outer office for the

Guest Comment

I may be the most unwelcome man in town after tonight, but it is time for someone to say out loud, "The king has no clothes." I am referring, of course, to the Holy Grail of the Lubbock County Teaching Hospital.

As of tonight, the legislature has refused to clear eight-million dollars in start-up funds, because too many legislators remembered the promise that the Lubbock Hospital would not cost the state. At the same time, the Lubbock area taxpayers, who were told they would not be burdened by heavy taxes to pay for the hospital, are already being taxed up to the legal limits of the law by the Hospital District. The pipe dream when this hospital was being promoted was that the federal government would pay the bill.

We have already accepted the reality of no help from Washington. But another pipe dream lives on. It is that somehow the people of this area can support that hospital with their taxes. We must realize that the tax base to keep that dollar-eating monster is not here ... and will not be here in this century.

The fallacy that we must have the Teaching Hospital to keep the Medical School, and that we must have the Medical School to keep Lubbock, must be dropped. If we admit that we cannot afford the hospital, it does not mean the automatic loss of the Medical School. Agreements for medical teaching can be worked out with other hospitals here and in other cities. For that matter, if we were to lose the Medical School, that does not mean that Lubbock would dry up and blow away. The Medical School is just one of dozens of major employers here.

It is time we quit praying to this sacred cow and realize that if we let it, it can eat us out of house and home.

Press Conference. Most press conferences in Lubbock are jokes—pure theater so the TV jocks can get a little SOF (sound on film) or ballyhoo their new electronics. Very rare anything meaningful comes out of a press conference.

So the players in the press conference go through the motions—very heavy, heavy questions about management philosophy and intergrating constituencies. The guy may have seen Lubbock twice before Monday, but he gives a creditable performance. No bouquets, but no catcalls either. Typical press conference.

Right at the end, questions asked, everybody is packing up their electronics and waiting for the Great Author in the Sky to write a close when Stella asks Bosworth in the sweetest little voice, "Can you tell me why it is that hospitals are so popular in soap operas?" You Decide.

Gay Blades in Dade

What's a Florida sunshine girl doing in Dade County, rolling queers?

One thing's for sure, Anita Bryant wasn't selling orange juice. She was leading the successful fight against a Dade County ordinance that banned discrimination against homosexuals. She thumped the Bible in support of her views and proved that if she ever decides to quit the o.j. biz, she can always get a job writing for know-nothing Archie Bunker. Memorable quote (paraphrased): If God had sanctioned homosexuality, He would have created Adam and Bruce.

Homosexuality is to the 1970s what long hair was to the 1960s. Will it really make any difference in the world history who sleeps with whom and why? Will it change the way nations protect or extend their national boundaries? Will it find any more sources of energy or allocate those we already have any better? Will it stop wars? You have to be a real die-hard to think it will do any of those things—a die-hard of the caliber to believe the inimitable Miss Bryant's admonitions that since homosexuals can't reproduce, they must, zombie-like, fan out through the public schools and snare up unsuspecting little children.

Wright THE PROGRESSIVE JOURNAL BULLETIN

Get serious. Sure, some homosexual teacher probably at some time got fresh with a student of his own gender. But for every such event there was probably a heterosexual teacher who got fresh with a student of the opposite gender.

The point is that the big danger to society and family unit and individual choice comes not form a small minority of people who have, for one reason or another, chosen to seek love from another of their sex, but from people who lump others into categories that blur the individual—whether the category is "nigger" or "blue-eyed" or "wop" or "leg-man" or "homosexual."

Computers Clicking on Capitol Hill

By THOMAS P. SOUTHWICK
Congressional Quarterly

WASHINGTON — Congress, an 18th century institution confronted with 20th century problems, is turning with increasing frequency to computers to help it cope with a burgeoning work load.

From the House floor to the computerized mailing operations of the Senate to the instant information systems of the Library of Congress, computers are reshaping the way business is done on Capitol Hill.

But Congress' interest in computers goes beyond its work load. The machines have enormous potential to help members get re-elected.

Members are using computers to answer mail from constituents and, more significantly, to write unsolicited letters to voters throughout their districts and states.

'Targeted' Mail

The computers permit members to "target" letters to specific groups of voters. One mail expert hired by a senator devised a system for targeting letters to airline pilots on what the senator was doing for aviation and to policemen on what he was doing for law enforcement.

The political impact of such computerized mailings is so great that the self-styled citizens lobby, Common Cause, has challenged its legality in court.

The lawsuit is directed at Congress' free-mailing privilege, but computers are a key ingredient of the complaint. Common Cause charges that the free congressional mail, particularly when targeted by computers, gives an incumbent an unfair advantage over a challenger—at taxpayers' expense.

Electronic Revolution

The computer revolution came late to Congress—beginning only about a decade ago. But the machines have caught on quickly. Last year Congress spent $25-million on its computer services.

Those responsible for planning the future use of computers in Congress believe that the machines can revolutionize the operations of the legislative branch.

"I can foresee a day when in the office of the future a member is equipped with a telephone, televised hookups to the House floor and other offices and two or three computers and will be able to make instantaneous decisions based on accurate, up-to-date information," says Rep. Charlie Rose (D N.C.), chairman of the House Computer Policy Group and a leading apostle of computer use in Congress.

Some Capitol Hill offices already have a jump on Rose's vision of the future. Using part of his official funds provided to hire staff workers, Rep. Dave Stockman (R Mich.) has leased a mini-computer in his office.

The machine now handles about 40 per cent of the congressman's mail, assembling pre-written paragraphs to produce "personalized" responses to constituents who write in asking for Stockman's views on a variety of issues.

Printing

A computerized printing system now being tested will make printed hearings available three weeks after the hearings are held. The process now takes three months. In addition to saving time, the new system will cut Congress' printing costs by about $10-million a year.

And Rose has been talking with administration officials about linking the executive branch computers with those in Congress so that every time an executive branch agency spent or collected money, issued a regulation or took any other action, it would be noted immediately in the congressional computer.

The result would give Congress an unprecedented ability to monitor and oversee actions of the executive branch.

Rose said that he tried out his idea on officials in the Ford administration last year and "they were fairly horrified." But he says that he will push the idea in the Carter administration, and he predicted that eventually it will become a reality.

Obstacles

The technology to make a reality of this and dozens of other schemes for using computers in Congress now exists. Most of the plans on the drawing boards can be handled by the computers now installed in the Senate Computer Center, the House Information System or the Library of Congress.

But several human and political obstacles remain to the expanded use of computers in Congress. Among them:

—Charges that the computers, particularly in the Senate, are being used to store political information and to generate mail to voting groups.

—Continued difficulties in training large numbers of congressional aides, mostly non-technical people, in using the machines efficiently.

—Persistent doubts among some members and aides about the wisdom of turning over to machines duties traditionally performed by people.

—The inability of the House and Senate to agree on a common structure to oversee the use of congressional computers—a failure that has resulted in quite different computer systems on the two sides of Congress.

Terminals

But despite these obstacles, the trend toward increased use of computers in Congress is clearly established and not likely to be reversed. Nearly all senators' offices and about half of the House members' offices are equipped with computer terminals.

No-campus College Offers Many Skills

In the city which boasts one of the largest land-grant college campuses in the world, a little building on Ave. Q, is a college that's been trying to make its way for several years, teaching technical and vocational training to business employees wanting to brush up their skills or to just-plain folks who want to learn.

The South Plains Regional Occupational Center at Lubbock has been holding classes in places all over the city, since there is no one building to house all the courses. This summer classes are meeting at the Lubbock Fire Department Training Center, the

Registration Set For Summer Camp

The Lubbock Camp Fire Council is offering a day camping program to both Camp Fire Girls and non-members. Sit sessions will be offered to boys and girls this summer at Camp Dakonya.

Five of the sessions will cost $10 for Camp Fire members and $15 for non-member. Session IV, for girls who have completed the sixth grade and have earned the first two Progressions in Out-of-Doors, cost $35 per camper.

Registration for sessions is at the Camp Fire Office at 1301 University and may be mailed in, along with the fee.

Lubbock State School and the University Hospital. During the fall and spring evening classes were held in area high schools, and in the training Center and State School.

The school will finally get permanent home in the fall of 1978, when it moves into the old West Texas Hospital Building. The building was donated to South Plains College by the American Medical International, Co. to provide local businesses and industries with qualified workers. The stipulation was that money be raised to pay off the remaining $160,000 owed on the mortgage.

A fund drive initiated by the Lubbock Chamber of Commerce among local businesses paid off the note, and a $2 million grant was awarded the college earlier this year by the Economic Development Administration.

B.P. Robinson, a rather dapper man serving as dean of the college, says the program offered is "unique. Almost anyone can come in for training in a variety of fields."

Admittance to the school is pretty loose, and students range from high school dropouts wanting to learn a profession to industry employees sent by their bosses to take supplementary courses.

The school offers a certificate of proficiency for a one-year program an associate of applied science degree for a two-year program. Robinson said the certificates are recognized by employers and other colleges and universities.

The courses range from respiratory therapy to real estate management, with a broad spectrum of classes in between.

Teachers are mostly local people who work part-time. Robinson said most of the teachers are professionals in the fields taught—for instance, real estate is taught by a real estate broker.

None of the teachers are full-time, but Robinson hopes to have a permanent staff when the college is moved to the new building, when the college finds a home.

They Go Together

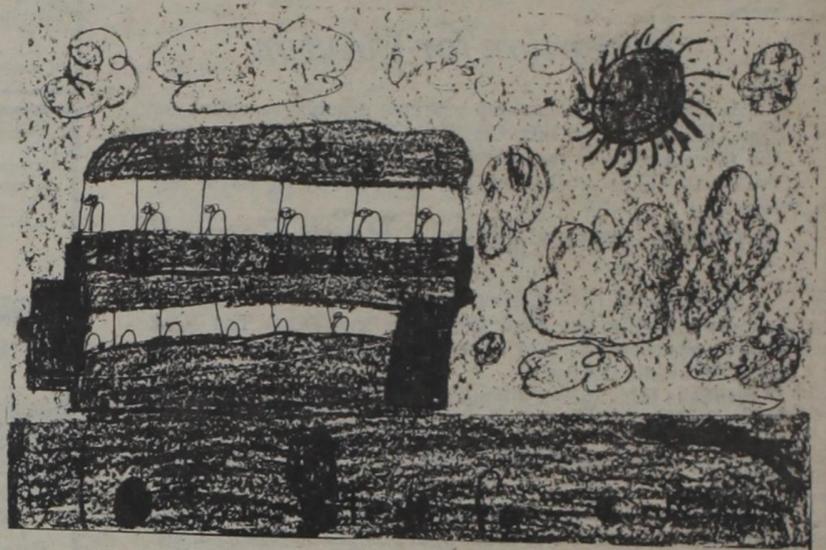

KLLL'S Double - Decker And KIDS

First graders from room 101 at Bayless elementary recently took a bus ride on the KLLL Double-decker. Afterward, they sent us pictures and letters telling us how much they enjoyed the excursion.

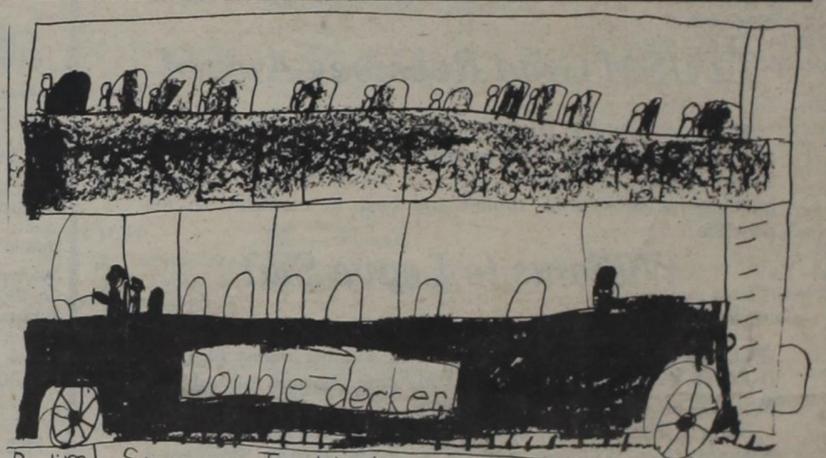

Our thanks to you, kids.

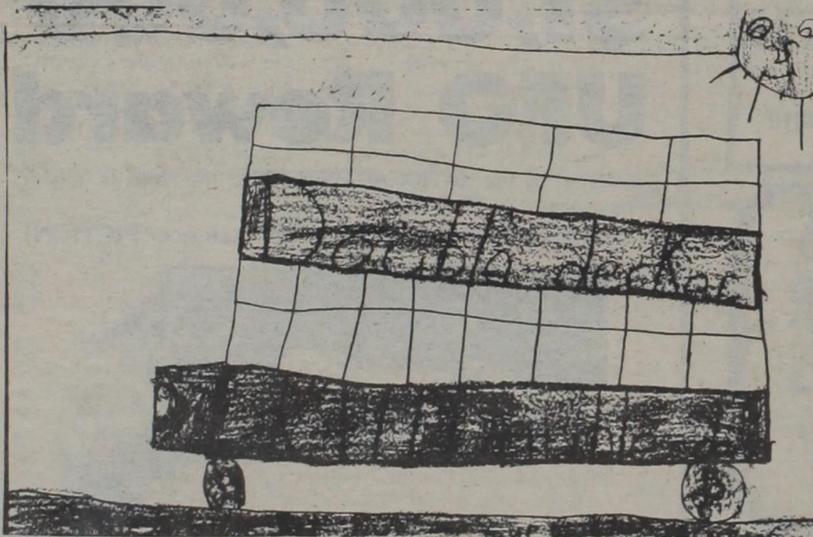

Thank you for the ride on the Double-Decker!

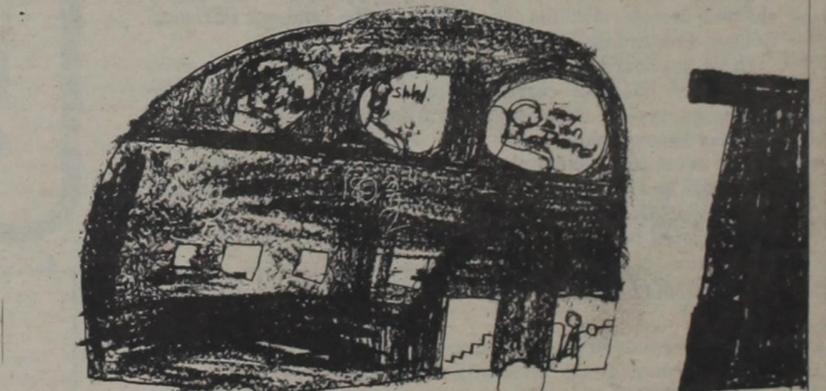

I like the KLLL bus and I like you to Steve. We had fun on the bus. From Curtis.

By Jim Steeve I liked to start the bus up by my self.

This is a picture for the man that drode the bus for us. I thank you for the fun. From Teresa Ann Martin.

The KLLL WAS FUN TO RADE ON

I like the It is good Thank you From Jason
