DONNA of the BIG TOP by BEULAH POYNTER

CHAPTER XLVII

Donna had waited so long for Bill's telegram, asking over and over again if a message had come for her, that when at last it was put in her hand she was afraid the printed words were a delusion.

There were only five words. "Come home first train, Bill."

She had unpacked only a few things from her traveling bag. In less than 15 minutes she had them all back, had snapped the lock, paid her bill and checked out of the hotel. It made little difference to Donna whether she had an hour or five minutes to wait at the station for a train. Once her ticket was in her purse, she would feel that she was on her way back to Bill.

Fortunately she did not have long to wait. There were just time to buy the ticket, telegraph Bill when the train would arrive, and then scurry through the gates.

On the long trip she rehearsed over and over in her mind how she would tell him her story—how she had deceived him about the real Madeline's death and the purpose of Con David's visit to Lebanon. Of one thing only was she positive. Bill had not believed that she had eloped with Con. He might have thought she had been married to Con, but never that she had run away with him.

Why had he waited so long to send for her? It must have been on account of the will! Bill had read the will and knew that the property was hers now.

The train wheels spun around and around, carrying her nearer to the climax of the drama.

Bill met her at the depot. He had become austere, grim-faced stranger who took her luggage without a word of greeting and then walked briskly to the little car, permitting her to get in without assistance.

His silence, his rigid lips and uncompromising attitude gave Donna no help in starting her confession. Twice during the ride over the snow-caked road she tried to tell him how grateful she was because he had sent for her, but the words stuck in her throat.

She managed at last to say, "Of course Grandfather is buried."

"Yes."

Miss Perkins had gone and the door that led into the room where Grandfather had lain for so many weeks was closed. Everything else seemed the same. Minnie rushed to meet Donna with open arms and burst into tears as she kissed her again and again.

"You shouldn't have went, Miss Siddel. You shouldn't have went! My lands, but I'm glad your're back!"

Bill's gruff, "That will do, Minnie," sent the girl back to the kitchen. When the husband and wife were alone in the little sitting room, Bill said, "Sit down. There's an explanation I want from you."

"You know," Donna choked, "that I wasn't married to Con David—ever?"

"Yes, I know that. I also knew that, in spite of the fact that everything points to it, you didn't run away with him. First, let me tell you that Grandfather left the farm and all the money he possessed to me."

"Oh, I'm glad," Donna cried. "I'm so glad!"

"Doesn't it strike you as curious that he should do that?"

"I don't know. But if he hadn't died so soon I was going to insist that he must change his will. If the farm is yours—why did you ask me to come back? I hoped it might be because you loved me but I know it isn't. You act as if you hate me."

"No, I'm waiting to hear the truth. I'm willing to accept any explanation if you can give me one, Madeline. Or should I call you Donna?"

She drew back. "You—you know?"

"I know part of it. Here read this." From his pocket he drew a folded sheet of paper and handed it to her. The handwriting ran obliquely, was uncertain and at times difficult to read.

"Dear Bill," Donna made out. "As we forgive our debtors so are we forgiven. When you read this, my boy, I shall be gone and you will be suffering a double pain, but if I can understand the motive that prompted the deception and take into my heart and home the deceiver how much easier it should be for you who have made her your wife!"

"She's a dear, sweet girl, my boy. And she loves you. The reason she deceived us doesn't matter much since she gave me more than she could have asked. At first I thought the property might be an attraction but I soon knew that wasn't true. Just realize, my boy, that you've a wife above many. Love her and cherish her and be happy."

"I have deeded the farm to you since the real Madeline, caring nothing for it or for me is not entitled to it and the masquerading Madeline could not hold it in court."

"Your loving Granduncle, Amos Siddel."

"Oh!" Donna sobbed. "He knew. He knew, and he didn't let me even suspect it."

"And this," Bill went on, "was addressed to you."

The second note began thus: "Little girl whose real name I do not know (although I believe you must be Madeline's partner, Donna Gabriel.) I am writing this to thank you for the happiness you gave me in my last days. At first I didn't know that you weren't the grandchild who left me in my old age and cared so little for me that she would not even spare a few hours to make an old man happy. I thought that time must have made the changes in your voice and features, yet from the day you came into the house I felt something—an added softness and a tenderness that Madeline did not have.

"Gradually, with the sight God gave me to take the place of the eyes I had lost, I saw you. I saw another girl, who for some reason, had chosen to play the part of my grandchild.

"And I loved you. I am thankful and grateful for the companionship and affection you have given me and I am glad you are Bill's wife. I pray that when he learns all this he will know, as I do, that you are sweet and good and that nothing must ever come between the love you bear for each other.

"Your Grandfather, Amos Siddel."

Tears rolled unheeded down Donna's cheeks. They were tears of gratitude, of tenderness and grief for the dear friend with the understanding heart. Bill watched her, his own eyes dimmed. There was a lump in his throat.

"Where is Madeline?" he asked.

"She's dead. She died last summer."

"And—"

"She was Con David's wife. I don't want to say anything unkind of her, but when I came to the farm the first time it was Madeline who persuaded me to do it. It seemed a lark to me. And after that I loved him—and the letters you wrote—"

"And?"

"After my accident she wrote you. She thought she was doing the right thing. Truly she did! She knew I would be helpless and ill for a long time. At first I didn't understand—and then I was so happy here, and she wanted me to stay. Oh, so many times I wanted to tell you the truth but I was afraid! I thought you would turn against me, and you had grown to mean so much to me. And if you had told Grandfather it would have been such a shock! All the time he knew—"

Bill did not answer, but stood staring at the carpet.

"Madeline loved Con," Donna went on. "He had wanted to marry me—but after I left he married ter. She didn't want me back in the circus. And then—you asked me to marry you. I meant to tell you the truth. Before God I meant to tell you! But Grandfather had that stroke and—oh, Bill, be generous! Say you understand. He did. Can't you?"

"I didn't mean to do anything wrong. It was just that I was so afraid of losing you! I thought you would be hard—like you are now. Bill, if you send me away I can't live! There isn't anything in life for me but you. There never has been since the time I first met you—!" She broke into bitter sobs.

He took her hands and pulled her to her feet. "Why did David come back here?" he demanded.

"He—he knew Grandfather was not well. He wanted to get the property that would have been Madeline's. I hate him! You believe that don't you?"

His arms folded her close. "Darling," he whispered, "if you had only trusted me what a lot of suffering we both would have been spared!"

"You won't send me away?"

"The next time you try to leave me I'll drag you back by the hair of your head," he laughed. But there was a sob in the laugh.

"Supper!" Minnie announced from the doorway. Then, "Oh—excuse me!" She saw Bill and Madeline in an embrace that not even her presence interrupted.

SMALL TALKS TO BRADY VOTERS JULY 4TH

Panhandle Candidate Warns Against All False Promises

Special To The Democrat BRADY, July 4.—Senator Clint Small made a jump from Terrell to reopen his West Texas campaign here.

he said, "offer economy in June and July and then battle against it in January when the legislature convenes. "Then we have those who go around promising old age pensions in one breath and a reduction of taxes in another. In the first place the governor can't bring about old age pensions. It takes a constitutional amendment voted by the people, just as it did for the Confederate pensions, for an expenditure of that nature. No governor can bring you old age pensions. If you want old age pensions, see your representative and senator about it. Only by a vote of the legislature can the question be submitted to the people," Small said.

divert a part of the gasoline tax from the highway department to other state departments. This move he declared, would cost the state more than seven million dollars in federal aid in 1935 and 1936.

Roosevelt Fishes Close To Bahamas

ABOARD U. S. S. GILMER ACCOMPANYING PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT, July 4.—President Roosevelt today tried his fortunes as a fisherman in British waters near the Bahama Islands.

The cruiser Houston, taking the President on a vacation journey which extend as far as Hawaii, was anchored early today west of Long Island. The President and his party left the cruiser in a launch to search for a likely fishing spot. His luck as a fisherman was sure to be reported accurately and in detail, because the President invited newspaper men and secret service agents on accompanying destroyers to join the fishing expedition in whale boats. Clouds protected the fishermen from the rays of the tropical sun.

ed newspaper men and secret service agents on accompanying destroyers to join the fishing expedition in whale boats. Clouds protected the fishermen from the rays of the tropical sun.

Aboard the presidential flotilla Independence Day was observed by the sailors with appropriate exercises and sports. For most of them it was a day off from customary duties.

A 21-inch gun salute was fired by the Houston at noon. The sailors then participated in potato races and other typical frolics.

Tomorrow the Houston was to start for the vicinity of Cape Haitian. From there it was scheduled to proceed to Puerto Rico, where the first landing of the cruise is to be made Friday.

Association Will Seek 15c Cotton

By Associated Press. NEW ORLEANS, July 5.—N. C. Williamson, president of the American Cotton Co-operative Association, announced in a statement that the association would campaign for full party price of 15 cents a pound for cotton.

The ACCA's program, he said, turns upon the vital necessity of increasing the buying power of the farmer by restoring the parity between the prices of things he has to sell and the prices of things he buys.

He said this may be accomplished by a loan of 15 cents, basis middling seven-eighths inch, with proper premium and discounts for grade, staple and location, "thus giving each farmer the just value of his cotton wherever located." Unless the price of cotton advances, Mr. Williamson's statement said, the growers will suffer a reduced purchasing power in this year's crop of almost $76,000,000 below that of 1932, because of the increased cost of goods they purchase.

Three Great Problems Facing Today's Women Make Plot For New Serial by Sophie Kerr

By Mary Margaret McBride

It isn't often that a celebrated novelist is willing to offer straight-from-the-shoulder answers to problems closely bound up with her readers' personal lives.

Sophie Kerr is an exception. In her newest novel, "Stay Out of My Life," to begin Sunday, July 8, in The Memphis Democrat, Mrs. Kerr tackles three arresting problems:

(1) Ought a girl propose to the man she loves?

(2) Is a wife happier than a single woman successful in business?

(3) What to do with the love child?

Here are her answers, tersely stated:

A girl may ask a man to marry her if she wants to, but she should have her eyes open to the fact that it probably won't work.

Whether a woman is happier managing a home or engaged in business depends entirely on the woman herself.

The woman who brings an illegitimate child into the world, as the world is now organized is guilty of a mean, cruel and selfish act.

"Please don't think," said Mrs. Kerr, "that I am objecting to the illegitimate child on moral grounds. What we call morals change so fast that by tomorrow such as we have may be destroyed. No, I'm basing my opinion upon public objection."

In "Stay Out of My Life," a leading woman character has a baby under benefit of the marriage ceremony. Discussing this character, the author said, "Curiously enough, Jane, the girl who had the baby is my favorite character. She has a ruthless courage and an intelligent self-interest that intrigue me, partly because they are so rare in a woman. Quite frankly, Jane was a grabber. Her brain was well organized but her emotions were not, and she constantly drove her brain against her emotions, although conscious of what she was doing and of its futility. She knew she couldn't have everything she wanted—her brain told her. Yet she felt she HAD to have success, love, one particular man, and she showed no quarter in her efforts to grab everything."

Because of her fear that life and society will take his mother's violation of the code out on the child, Mrs. Kerr has very little patience with those sentimentalists who contend that every woman who wants a child has a right to have it.

"Remember in Sinclair Lewis' 'Ann Vickers' the heroine says that by the time her child grows up there won't be any such thing as scandal? Maybe there won't be but there is now, and even though the mother may try to take all the blame on her shoulders the child will have to face bitter difficulties and complexities.

"Life is hard enough, it seems to me, without adding a handicap like that one. Of course, in time, public opinion may change, if it does, then the entire situation will be altered."

Mrs. Kerr suggests that the unmarried woman who feels that she simply must have a little one around the house adopt a fondling.

"Flinging a gauntlet to the world by having your own outside the conventions," she says, "may be a very grand gesture but it is like all grand gestures—difficult to maintain after it is made. And even if you do maintain a grand gesture what happens? You become an outstanding spiritual snob that's what! Have you ever known one of those too noble women whom you'd like to choke?" There's a lot of tosh talk about the maternal instinct, Mrs. Kerr thinks. Not nearly as many women have it, she opines, as boast of having it. And not nearly as many love all children as claim to do it.

"I could show the professional child lover some little jimps she wouldn't love," she mused, a sardonic gleam in her eye.

Then she added: "Mind you, if a woman chooses to have a fatherless baby and goes through with it, there's nothing to do but make the best of it as Jane did (she turned hers over to somebody else to bring up, of course!) But what I mean is, she didn't weep and wail over what was past and done. She simply charged it to experience, forgot it and went on to whatever life held for her.

"I believe with Jane that you have to choose what you want and then go after it. As for post-mortems, they do nobody any good."

In "Stay Out of My Life," Mrs.

1. Can a Girl Propose to the Man She Loves?

2. Is a Wife Happier Than a Single Woman Successful in Business?

Sophie Kerr

One of the many beautiful photographic illustrations for Sophie Kerr's new serial story. In this picture Jane Terry, leading character, tricks the man she loves into proposing.

Kerr also deals with the problem of a girl who, impatient because her suitor does not propose, decides to do the deed herself.

The author warns girls who contemplate this step: "If your young man says yes because he can't bear to say no to a woman (believe it or not, there really are some men like that in the world) and goes through with it, a more or less reluctant sacrifice to chivalry, the two of you will probably finish up in the divorce courts.

"Even if he says yes because he really loves you and had meant all the time to ask you to marry him, then mark down here and now that there will be many uncomfortable moments in your life together when both you and he will remember that you did the proposing.

"Of course if he says no, that's worst of all, for neither you nor he will ever forget it. The memory will spoil all chances for friendship between you and the woman will probably carry a sense of humiliation and inadequacy through life."

Mrs. Kerr believes the average modern man is likely to say no if that's the way he feels. Unlike his grandfather, he refuses to be wanted into an engagement he doesn't want. Or at least if he lets himself in for it during a moment of sheer terror and embarrassment he will get himself out as soon as he has time to think of a way.

"I heard of a case just the other day," the author relates. "This young man decided he'd been roped into an engagement with a girl. He thought it all over and then he deliberately broke it off. The girl was very much in love with him and at first she refused to accept his decision. She kept telephoning and writing him, begging him to see her.

"At last he got tired of that and persuaded his company to transfer him to one of its European branches. In due course he put the ocean between himself and his former fiancée and in 20 years I'm sure she'll be very glad he did, although she's heart-broken now.

"Any unequal relationship is unhappy and unsatisfactory—I don't care what it is. If the mother loves her son more than he loves her, or one friend cares more than the other, the situation is sure to cause grief at times.

"I think it is a matter for rejoicing that civilization should have reached the point where a man no longer feels bound to marry a woman just because she wants him to and tell him so. In the past I have no doubt there were hundreds of marriages on that basis, but I don't believe they worked any better than they do now.

"The question I always ask about anything is 'will it work?' If it won't, then better leave it alone. Of course, there may have been instances when it was all right for the woman to propose. It may have worked out too, in some cases. But I don't happen to know any of them!"

The question of marriage versus careers seems to Mrs. Kerr entirely an individual problem. In "Stay Out of My Life" the two principal characters completely exemplify this belief of hers. One is definitely the type of woman who ought to have a career. She would never fit into the home-making role, nor be happy there. The other finds all her contentment for the man she loves. Each is happy and each feels a little sorry for the other—which, according to Mrs. Kerr, is the way it should be.

Certain women, Mrs. Kerr thinks, are capable of managing both homes and careers at the same time, though these are rare. "One thing that strikes me as a great waste of time, is for the married woman to worry about whether she will continue to use her maiden name or will assume her husband's," comments Mrs. Kerr.

"I can't see why an intelligent woman should worry about such a trivial matter for a minute. What does it matter? All that matters is the way you do your work. And you can do that as well under one name as another.

"Another idea of many women workers is that women make bad bosses. The best boss I ever had was a woman and the easiest person to work for was that same woman! In my opinion there is something the matter with the woman who can't work for a woman. It is she who is at fault, not her woman boss!"
