It is a mistake to make grain the principal food for laying hens. Grain is well enough as food for market fowls but the laying hen demands something more. The egg itself is animal food, and although it can be produced from grain, yet the heu is required in order to be profitable, to produce an egg each day, or as near that possible, and her work must not be interrupted from lack of the necessary nutriments. Meat fills a want that can not easily be supplied from any other source when the hens are laying regularly.
