Surveying wheat damage . . .

LOOKING FOR WHEAT DAMAGE . . . Hansford county Extension Agent Burt Williams surveys a Hansford wheat crop for freeze damage caused by the unseasonable cold snap which rolled through the area in late March. Damage estimates to Hansford wheat appears to be about 25-30 percent while crops in the South Plains appear to be affected more adversely with reports of 50 to 100 percent damage.

Wheat damage not as severe in Hansford

Hansford county wheat producers are taking careful stock of their wheat crops as reports of freeze damage surfaces across the Panhandle area. And, while damage is being reported, Hansford production may not be affected as badly as areas further south, reports Hansford county extension agent, Burt Williams.

Last month's freeze caught Panhandle wheat fields with wheat stalks flourishing; the further south, the taller the plant and the greater the damage caused by the unseasonable cold snap which roared through the Texas Panhandle.

"Wheat that had been grazed is in pretty good shape."

Areas further south near Lubbock are reporting losses from 50 percent to total crop failure, notes ASCS executive director, Keith Martin. Meanwhile, he notes that acreage affected in Hansford may run 25 percent to 30 percent.

Areas further south near Lubbock are reporting losses from 50 percent to total crop failure, notes ASCS executive director, Keith Martin. Meanwhile, he notes that acreage affected in Hansford may run 25 percent to 30 percent.

Hansford wheat producers ranked second in wheat cut in 1986 despite a poor production year, reports Williams. That year some 160,000 wheat acres were cut, producing 4.75 million bushels.

With approximately the same acreage in 1985, Hansford ranked first in the state with 7.56 million bushels produced.

An agronomist from the Texas A&M extension service reported in an Amarillo meeting this week that in field surveys from Spearman to Post wheat north of Amarillo was not hurt as bad as that to the south.

Dr. Brent Bean, the A&M agronomist said farmers could assess damage by looking at the clumps of wheat and check the tillers for firmness, color and growth. A clump that had damaged plants in it will have soft, yellowing tillers with stunted growth, he said.

Warm weather has helped to determine damage fairly easily, he reports. "It's possible, though, that some of the good looking wheat could have damaged heads. You have to cut into the stem and look at the head; if it's turning brown, it sustained some damage."

Williams reports that heads in Hansford fields appear to be in good shape. "There's a lot we won't know until the combines are in the fields," he cautions.

At this point of growth, Bean said some of the heads may be one-half inch long. He said if the head is in good shape now and has turgid color to it, it should be good through the remaining growth stages.

The A&M agronomist reported minimal difference in amounts of damage sustained according to variety, but the amount of time cattle are left on the wheat to graze has made a difference.

In addition to head damage, producers could see more lodging than usual this year because the freeze weakened the stems.

Hansford producers do have the option to have their fields certified as a disaster, but certification and disaster application must be made by May 15 to the Hansford ASCS office.

"Hansford farmers should remember just because we (ASCS) release a field, it doesn't mean that federal crop insurance will," urges Martin. "They should check with them before doing anything to their crop."

By getting the disaster claim filed and released by the appropriate agencies, farmers could plant grain sorghum on it before June 30. The grain sorghum won't apply to the crop history and the producer's wheat program and deficiency payments won't be affected.

Farmers may also graze the fields out with livestock or cut and bale the wheat for hay.

Karen's Cozy Corner

by Karen Babitzke

Perennials are flowering or foliage plants whose roots live from year to year. Their tops may or may not die back in the winter.

Perennials give color to the garden in a shady spot and in front of shrubs. They are colorful in spring and throughout the growing season.

Some perennials flower the first year. you can grow them as annuals and eliminate the problem of protecting them in the winter.

Usually perennials will not flower unless they develop to a certain size and are then exposed to low temperature for a number of weeks, then exposed to increasing day lengths and increasing temperatures. Their flowering time is the result of this sequence of day length and temperature.

Although perennials require constant care, they do well in most parts of the United States.

Among the most popular of the garden perennials are delphinium, alyssum, hollyhock, columbine, candytuft, carnation, and primrose.

To grow perennials successfully prepare soil in the flower beds thoroughly;

Start with vigorous plants or seeds. The best plan is to buy started plants. Next best is to sow fresh seed where the plants are to grow. Usually, the least satisfactory plan is to start your own plants indoors.

Set out plants or sow seed at the recommended times. Plants set out too early may be killed by frost. Seeds will not germinate until the soil warms and, if sown too early, they may rot. However, early spring growth is important for the survival of many perennials.

Provide the recommended distances between plants when thinning seedlings or setting out started plants. Proper spacing is necessary for fullest development of the plants.

Do not grow annuals that crowd and grow wildly in the same bed with perennials; they will crowd the perennials.

Let the perennials stand out. Give them a back ground to show them off. Evergreens or wooden fences make good backgrounds.

Do not consider perennials as permanent plants. Replanting, dividing old plants, and preparing the soil are essential for vigorous, flowering plants.

GRAND OPENING... McClure's Paint and Supply celebrated their grand opening with a ribbon cutting in

UNITED STATES RIG COUNT 1987 VS 1986 & 1985

U. S. Rig Count*: Week of April 20, 1987. Count, 750. Change From Previous Week, Up1. Comments: For every drilling rig currently at work in the United States, three more are stacked as a result of the continuing drilling downturn. According to the International Association of Drilling Contractors, the number of domestic rotary rigs currently available for work is 3,050. That figure includes the 750 rigs working this week. But a San Antonio auctioneering firm specializing in oilfield equipment says the number of usable rigs in America is falling fast. Based on data from its own auctions and sales by others, Superior Auctioneering and Marketing estimates that 270 of the 347 drilling rigs auctioned in 1986 were sold for scrap or cannibalized for parts. A partner in the firm says that approximately 70% of the nation's idle rigs are owned by banks, which obtained them through foreclosures, bankruptcies and other means. Data compiled and reported by Hughes Tool Company.
