O'DANIEL GETS

AUSTIN, Jan. 17.—Wilbert Lee O'Daniel of Fort Worth today became governor of Texas before the largest crowd ever to witness an inauguration in the state.

The 49-year-old former flour salesman wore a dark gray pin stripe business suit and a handmade silk tie as he stood with hand upraised and repeated the oath of office.

Eight months ago he was politically unknown. He had not even paid a poll tax so he could vote in Texas elections. At the request of many radio listeners, O'Daniel entered the campaign on June 14, and won the democratic nomination in July with 665,300 votes and had less than 12,000 votes against him in the general elec-

Life Is Cheap but Worth Saving

Is it worth while to save 7400 lives?

Life is cheap today, what with Spaniards slitting the throats of brother Spaniards and Japanese bombing or machine-gunning the Chinese. And yet life is not so cheap in every part of the world that it is not worth saving at all.

The United States may well be proud of those 7400 lives saved. It didn't just happen. It was the result of careful planning, unrelenting effort, willing co-operation on the part of millions of United States citizens.

It came about this way. In 1937, traffic fatalities in horrifying number of victims of the mere routine of traffic. No other country approaches it. That is because the United States has come farthest along the road to mechanization. It has more autos on the roads, more roads, more miles traveled, than any other country in the world. Also, it led the world in the number of dead who paid with their lives for the speed of today's daily existence.

It was, and it is still, a horrifying toll, considering that most of these victims had done nothing to deserve death; most of them, indeed, had observed every precaution possible, and still had been struck down by forces outside their control.

During the last year, under leadership of the National Safety Council, the campaign to cut down this death toll moved steadily forward to triumph.

While final figures for 1938 have yet to be compiled, there is every indication that the 1938 toll will be the lowest since 1933. Even if the figures for December shall prove to be the same as those for 1937, the saving in life will have been 7400 during the year.

But if the rate of reduction should prove to have been maintained during December the saving may be as high as 8000. Last November marked the 13th consecutive month of unbroken improvement in traffic safety conditions.

Have you as a motorist been inconvenienced slightly by brake tests, license tests, apparently unnecessary traffic regulations? Have you as a pedestrian been harassed by crossing lights and corner traffic policemen?

Maybe you think you have. But the next time you are inclined to be annoyed by traffic regulations that seem a bit oppressive, think of those 7400 people who are alive today, and who might be dead. Human life, some of us still believe, is a precious thing, well worth going to considerable pains to save.
