The assault and attempted robbery occurred around 5 a. m. on Feb. 25. The two men drove into the station and asked permission to park a U-Haul truck and spend the night. ## Outdoor Classrooms Catching On In Many of The Larger Cities

If you see students planting trees on a school campus or catching frogs from a miniature pond, don't panic.

They are probably studying nature in an outdoor classroom - a new concept in environmental education.

"At last count, we had helped plan and install some 343 outdoor learning areas in Texas," said Edward E. Thomas of Temple, state conservationist for the U. S. Soil Conservation Service. "And the number grows each week, especially in the larger cities."

Thomas said SCS assistance includes soil and plant adaptation guidelines, planning erosion control measures, laying out nature trails, identifying plants, designing small water holding areas for aquatic studies and other technical help.

A recent survey revealed that nearly 900 individual schools plus 48 school districts are using the 343 outdoor classrooms. Some 1,700 other groups - from Boy Scouts to adult organizations to convalescent hospital patients - also use the areas.

Learning features used in outdoor classrooms include soil and water conservation examples, plant and animal identification, historical studies, and aquatic life. Some areas also double as outdoor laboratories.

A total of 728 groups and organizations are helping schools install and maintain learning areas in Texas. These range from the American Association of University Women to parent-teacher organizations to a radio station.

Thomas said SCS first became involved in outdoor learning areas by helping schools cure campus erosion problems. Then someone suggested that letting students help install some of the conservation measures would be an excellent learning experience. From that came the idea that trees, grass and shrubbery could be added to beautify the conservation measures or to attract wildlife. Eventually, the idea of installing complete outdoor environmental learning areas evolved.

Students enjoy planning and installing the classrooms themselves over a period of months or years, Thomas said. This also enhances the learning experience, helping students gain a deep appreciation of the interrelationship between man, soil, plant, water, animals and sunshine.

Uses of outdoor classrooms varies, depending upon the ingenuity of the teacher. Some biology classes study microscopic growth in tiny ponds built on the school campus; chemistry classes conduct soil and water related experiments; math classes compute slope and elevation or estimate the heights; and language art classes write articles or poems based on outdoor sounds or observations.

For help in getting started on an outdoor learning area, SCS has a new publication entitled Outdoor Classrooms on School Sites. To get a free copy, call the nearest SCS office, or write Soil Conservation Service, P. O. Box 648, Temple, Texas 76701.
