What could make the home and home life brighter and happier at Easter-time than one of our new electric stoves or an electric refrigerator.? With these additions to the home there would be more spare time for rest, reading and recreation.

Food has always been the actuating problem of the human race, and the question now is not so much its production as its preservation.

Our primitive ancestors found that food could be dried, smoked, salted and for a time kept from deterioration, and thus processes of curing began. The people in more northern countries found that meats and other foods kept perfectly when frozen and the idea of refrigeration had its inception.

The electric refrigerator solved the problem of the perfect preservation of foods during the warmer seasons. For a small sum you can buy an electric refrigerator that will soon pay for itself in preventing the spoilage of foods in a medium sized family, not to speak of the greater comfort of having frozen desserts and ice cubes for drinks as a by-product.

The electric refrigerator is perhaps the outstanding invention for the home for all ages, and Easter-time is the logical time to begin laying plans for the purchase of one.

FAMED NEW ORLEANS MARKET MUST MOVE

Forced to Make Room for the Mississippi River.

Washington .- To the old French market on New Orleans' waterfront, the river has given much. And now the river is taking away. In order to handle the shifty yellow Mississippi in its S-curves about the city the levee must be moved back and the French market must move over to make room. It will be renovated at the same time, substituting the odor of damp concrete for the odors of sanctity and fish and vegetables of almost a century and a haif.

"In its sundrenched space between the city and the Mississippi, the old French market is a mellow symbol of a vanishing era," says the National Geographic society. "Brilliant colors smoulder in its deep shade, luring visitors for a pleasant cup of coffee as well as the sterner business of buying and selling foodstuffs.

Market Dates From 1795.

"The market sprawls over three blocks, a jungle of awninged stalls, piles of crates, and white-tiled booths, astir with the slow amble of chatting shoppers. Covered banquettes, or sidewalks, are littered with the overflow of informal merchants whose only wares are a few baskets of fruit or vegetables spread around them on table or

"On one side lie dreary smudges of railroad tracks, and then the Mississippi, here treacherous, yellow, and muddy, with its shutling ferries and moored sea-going vessels. Cityward its neighbors are the statuary of Jackson square, the iron-balconied Pontalba apartments, the Cabildo in which Louisiana was formally transferred to the United States in 1803, and the tranquillity of St. Mary's church and the Convent of the Ursulines.

"The market has a fascinating history. It was built under a Spanish governor in 1795, for the elegant Creole population of Nouvelle Orleans, mainly pure-blooded French and Spanish born in America. A hurricane destroyed the original structure, but in 1813 its rebuilding as a meat market began under the United States government, with enough French patronage still to give the new structure a French name: Halle des Boucheries.

"In a few years the market covered an adjacent block, dedicated to vegetables, and later still a third, for fish. Thus the area between St. Ann street and Ursuline street became honeycombed with white-tiled cubicles and their delectable stores of Louisiana's products.

"A coffee shop in the French market modestly claims the honor of having instituted the universal cusom in New Orleans of stopping dur- Postponed B. T. U. ing business and after pleasure for a cup of thick black drip coffee. Now many coffee stalls offer the popular Creole beverage with a delicate seasoning of chicory, and their tiny oll-cloth-covered tables are a popular pastime with visitors and an established habit with residents.

Many Noted Visitors.

"In its patrons as well as in its bistory the French market has international alliances. Andrew Jackson and the pirate Lafitte are said to have stalked across its sawdustcovered flagstones. Adelina l'atti, after making her first American appearance at New Orleans' French opera house, took a keen interest in delicacles of Creole cooking, delicacles which the French market appplied. Audubon, on his second day in the city in 1821, found his way to the bird sellers in the French market and lamented that such a great array had been killed. Surely the coffee shops knew Mark Twain, O. Henry, George Washington Cable, W. M. Thackeray, Lafcadio Hearn, and others seeking to fathom Creole

"Rarer now are Indian women offering bunches of dried and fresh herbs. Italians, both men and women, predominate among the venders. Farmers and share-croppers, black baskets of their produce, or outside lean wistfully over the lowered tail-boards of their wagons or trucks. "Most attentive to the displays are negro women, heads swathed in the tignon, or bright bandanna, who carry big market baskets or shopping bags to fill for their 'white folks.' To encourage them as regular customers, merchants offer them lagnlappe, or a little bonus, on transactions. "A tour through the French market is a visit to Louisiana's own informal natural history museum, with all the state's flora and fauna on parade in rich profusion and amiable disarray. Visitors and residents alike hope that the remodeled market will carry on the culinary traditions of the market of old."

ART TO DEPICT U. S. HISTORY IN MUSEUM

Paintings, Maps and Sculptures Being Prepared.

Washington.-Painting, miniature sculptures and maps depicting outstanding events connected with the activities of the Interior department are being prepared for the museum of the new Interior department building to be completed next Recently Secretary Ickes announced that artists, sculptors and cartographers were at work in a ield laboratory at Morristown, N. , assembling material.

All branches and divisions of the Interior department are co-operatng with the national parks service n developing the museum. Because of the widening activities of this bureau, their portrayal necessarily will tell in a large measure the history and growth of the country.

The story of the early pioneers in their struggle with the Indians and the forces of nature, the gradual development of the country in mining, geology and human relations will be graphically depicted. Some of the bureaus to be portrayed are the Indian bureau, reclamation, national parks service, geological survey, bureau of mines and the grazing division.

The paintings, illustrating the hardships of the men and women who blazed the trail across the continent, will be hung above the cases containing the sculptured exhibits. Among these illustrations, painted by Wilfred Bronson, are "The Covered Wagon" and other scenes depicting the lives of the pioneers and their struggle for existence.

The miniature sculptures, made from plaster of paris and skillfully painted for realistic effect, are being prepared by Rosario Fiori, Basil E. Martin, Albert McClure, Donald M. Johnson and Lyman Royal.

The illuminated relief and flat mans, charts and drawings illustrating the progress of man are being prepared by Arthur Ohlman, Otto Jahn, Joseph Andrew and Harry Wood.
