Chapter One

"You know something? This is the first time your friend Clarence has ever been on the level." The observation, commonplace enough under most circumstances, took on new pungency by virtue of the fact that the Clarence referred to was, at the moment, reclining in a wooden box. John Webb, attorney-about-town and at the moment one of the ballbearers at the public funeral of the late Highway Commissioner Clarence Buchman, had whispered the remark to another ostensible friend of the deceased — Vincent Cushing, political leader and Buchman's accomplice in the cornering of the State highway contracts. Clarence, by an almost classical example of poetic justice, had been killed in an auto that skidded on one of his own defective highways!

As they paused for photographs, panting under the weight of the basket, Rus Sampson, Webb's bosom friend and partner, slid another remark in Cushing's direction.

"I heard your stooge, Senator Berry, try to shove the new Highway Bill through the legislature yesterday."

"Fine man, Senator Berry," said the heavy-set, steel-jawed Cushing complacently.

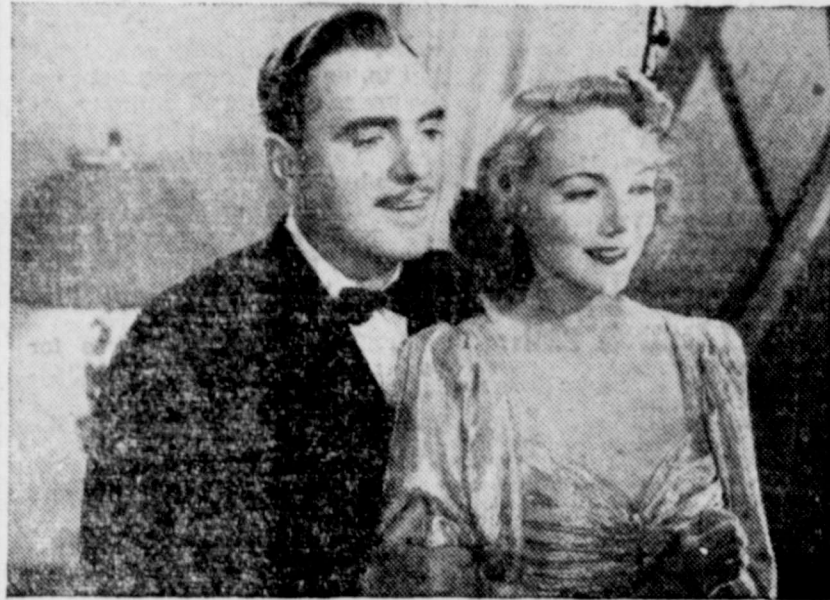

In another moment the dancing girls, having finished their number on the floor, swarmed upstairs to mingle dutifully (and unreluctantly) with the guests. The flock of gentlemen wolves crowded around. "Look, Johnny," smiled Alma. "That comes under the head of unfinished business for you." She indicated a little dark-haired, sultry-eyed trinket whom Webb had watched with more than cursory interest as she sang a song on the dance floor.

Webb, quickly recovering from his sentimental mood, made his excuses to Alma and approached the little singer, and suggested a dance. They moved off to the dance floor, but two minutes of Webb's dancing convinced them both that sitting at a table would be real fun.

Webb continued to lie beautifully, complimenting her on her singing, as they found their table and sat down.

"I was in a chorus before," said Ann Seymour, "but Mr. Godena said I was just wasting my time hoofing and he gave me this job. I think I need a few lessons — but, that's just between you and me."

"I wouldn't breathe it to a soul," "The girl I live with," she rushed on without ever a pause for breath, "said if I played my cards right I could get to be a radio

"I've often wondered if we'd have worked out together."

"I've often wondered if we'd have worked out together."

"Why don't they tear down Senator Berry and put up a comfort station?" mused Webb. "Tell me, Cushing — what do you pave those roads with — tapioca?"

"Yes. But we put raisins in to make it hard."

"Sounds awfully rich to me!"

They reached the hearse, and performed their solemn duty.

The two lawyer gentlemen and their suave adversary met again that evening at a party in the upper reaches of Pete Godena's night club; a pleasure backed by Cushing's money, where Cafe Society and swallow-tailed gunmen rubbed shoulders of an evening. Webb and Sampson had been invited there by Alma Brehmer, Webb's old flame who now held the more lucrative, if less exciting, position of Cushing's official lady friend.

While Cushing kept a hostile and suspicious eye on them, Webb and Alma partook of a refreshing interlude at the bar. A loud, drunken voice near the entrance interrupted their reminiscences.

"George Taylor, my ex-husband," said Alma. "I recognize that snarl."

"Where is she?" yelled the fellow thickly. "I'll wring her skinny neck!" Then he caught sight of Webb with his lost lady. "I was talked into a divorce by that shyster," he babbled. "She's my wife—she's coming with me or I'll—"

Pete Godena stepped forward and shoved him backward into the elevator, which promptly slammed shut, removing Mr. Taylor from the proceedings.

"You certainly can pick 'em," Webb told Alma. He looked at her piquant, still handsome face. "A funny thing — I've often wondered if we'd have worked out together."

She looked down at her shoes. "Why kid ourselves, Johnny? The boat has sailed."

singer, then I could save, and by the time I'm twenty-one I could—"

"Hold it!" cried Webb. "How old did you say you were?"

"Eighteen."

One thing John Webb had always insisted on doing was to obey what he euphemistically called the "fishing laws" — and the "fishing laws" in this particular State protected little fishes under the age of 21. Regrettably, he decided to throw back Miss Seymour, excused himself, and drifted away in search of Alma again.

But his attention was almost immediately yanked back to the little dark-haired lady when she rent the smoke-thick atmosphere of the club with a loud shriek. Wheeling around, Webb beheld her employer, Pete Godena, slapping her face and tearing at her dress as his form of protest at her hobnobbing with the wrong people.

Webb sped across the room and, without stopping to take aim, drove a competent fist into Godena's teeth. Godena sprawled on his knees and several very harsh-looking gentlemen started to move forward in Webb's direction. Rus Sampson, a jewel in an emergency, sprang forward with both his own and Webb's hat and coat, and the three quickly made their way to the street.

Webb decided to take the almost hysterical girl home to his apartment for rest and black coffee. He planted her carefully in a chair, solicitously rubbed the ankle which Godena had stepped on in their affray, and then, when she had calmed down, went into the kitchen to make coffee.

When he returned a few minutes later, Ann was standing in the middle of the room, holding her dress in her hands and gazing speculatively at the torn places in it.

A PLEA FOR NATIONAL UNITY

While measures designed to insure the defense of the United States and the Western Hemisphere are being considered by the Congress, it is well, I feel, to consider the broader aspects of the national defense picture as it presents itself today.

If the recommendations of President Roosevelt are adopted by the House and the Senate, the United States will endeavor within a relatively short period of time to prepare itself for the eventuality of an Allied defeat in Europe. Our shaky defense structure will undergo a reorganization that will, if time permits obviate the possibility of a successful blitzkrieg in this hemisphere.

But guns and planes and battle-ships alone will not make the United States invulnerable to attack. For we have seen in the Netherlands and in Norway that the aggressor state does not rely solely upon the power of its arms even though it may possess the best army and air force in the world and may hold a tremendous superiority in the weapons of war essential to easy conquest.

The modern aggressor prepares the way for his legions of battle by creating disunity within the state which he intends to destroy. He organizes "fifth column" or subversive elements within the country itself which not only aid the invading army but seek to paralyze resistance within both before and after the war has begun.

For the present, it is with the activities of these elements before the actual outbreak of war that we are concerned. Now is the time for Americans to realize that something more than actual armed strength is necessary to preserve our integrity if and when we are attacked.

Poland possessed a superb army trained by French technicians; Holland had nearly a million men under arms when the Nazi hordes crossed the frontier. Yet neither of these countries was able to present effective resistance to the invader. And the answer to this anomaly does not lie entirely in the air superiority of the Germans.

The Poles were weakened by internal disunity, by quarrels between the minority elements and the dominant Polish element. The Dutch were betrayed by Nazi sympathizers.

The people of the United States must avoid the pitfalls into which these unfortunate peoples fell. We must bolster our tangible defense efforts by promoting national unity at home—by forgetting our domestic quarrels, by subordinating the conflicts of left and right, capital and labor, Republicans and Democrats, to the more impelling objective of a solid defense front against any who may challenge our right to live as we see fit and to preserve our basic institutions.

As a first step in this direction, our government authorities, and particularly the President, must be utterly and completely frank with the people. There must be no cloaking of the facts as was done in England, when month after month Prime Minister Chamberlain told that all was well with the war. Norway and Belgium followed.

This does not mean that government secrets must be broadcast to the entire world. But it does mean that the people must be told in frank and uncouched language of the perils facing this country in the months ahead, of the necessity for each and every loyal American to devote himself to the task of building up a strong and indestructible defense at home. Not every citizen can participate in the manufacture of cannon and warships; but every citizen can assist in the creation of a spirit of personal sacrifice before the all-encompassing interests of the nation.

Never before in the history of the American Republic has the threat to our security been so imminent and destructive. Only after eight months of war did the British and French peoples fully realize that they were engaged in a death struggle—and perhaps they awoke to this realization too late. Their lethargy was attributable in large part to failure of their leaders to realize the peril and gravity of the situation.

America must not make a fatal delay in awakening to the threat to our security. There must be no defeats in our own sphere of influence comparable to the disasters in Holland and Belgium to teach us that our interests are endangered, that our country is in peril.

As a further step in preparing for future emergencies, all discordant elements within the country must compose their differences immediately before the greater objective of national preparedness. The left must unite with the right, as labor has done with the conservatives in Britain, to demonstrate its willingness to cooperate in the program of national defense.

The hatreds engendered by seven years of conflict between labor and capital, with the government arrayed on the side of labor, must be composed, for labor and capital alike suffer under Fascist rule.

Within the government itself, there must be a realization that there can be no national consciousness so long as one element or the economic order is the brunt of constant harrissment. The smooth functioning of the industrial machine of the country is essential to the establishment and maintenance of adequate defense forces on land, the sea and the air. Industry must be freed of attack by the leftist cabal which exerts so much influence at the White House.

The American people, I submit, are preparing themselves to fight and to die, if necessary, to protect our traditional way of life. They
