France's Peculiar Ideas Concerning Le Box

S OME old Americans in France are still prizzled. They look back on a time (it seems yesterday) when boxing had simply no existence in France, when the world's heavyweight championship could be fought at Chantilly as on a desert island. The eyes of all America and Great Britain were on it

"Sullivan and Mitchell Went Out for to Fight . . ."

Yet to Frenchmen (in four newspaper lines, next day) the match appeared eccentric, barbarous, incomprehensible, uninteresting and completely negligible,

That period lasted uptil really yesterday-say, 1907. Yet in the Spring of 1914 Paris considered herself the pugilistic center of the world. And now-Carpentier!

Carpentier is all right. But has there been time for it to get into their blood and bone, to produce great natural fighters? Remember, France was often misjudged before the war. France was not degenerate, but pacific, and unprepared with heavy artillery. She took those German shells on her bare chinned tragedians, three pale youths

As the poet says, "where are the snows of a year ago!"

Nor Jennette, nor McVey, nor Langford, nor Jack Johnson are champions!

Paris has seen everything, read everything.

When Carpentier, "the premier fist of France," at London in 1913, "put knock-out" Bombadier Wells in 73 seconds-after having done it in four rounds at Ghent, "just to see if he could"-he won the heavyweight championship of Europe.

The fair, which was by far the most colossal of any of its series-the first fair was held in 1915-is more than a thrust at Germany's famous Leipzig Fair. It was more than an effort to beat down the American exchange by attracting American buyers. It was well-planned impetus for the development of British exports to a new highwater mark. As soon as it closes, its displays of goods were made up in four traveling exhibitions to tour the British Dominions, the Far East, South America and the United States.

Carefully Planned.

British manufacturers are already being canvassed by the Board of Trade of the British government, under whose auspices this world trade campaign has been planned down to the smallest detail, with a view to securing their support in the placing of these traveling exhibitions on a permanent foundation. It has also become known that the British govern-and payment is almost immediate, hence profits in the home market and filled up with goods. Prices are high, people are able to buy as they were never able before, and a reaction will inevitably set in sooner or later in the home market. When that time comes, it is British overseas trade upon which British merchants and manufacturers must depend, and if that overseas trade is not at once developed, the high cost of living will not be reduced. It would be wise for merchants and manufacturers to begin at once setting aside a certain proportion of the goods they have to sell for sale overseas." The backing which the ecent fair had may be realized from the nature of the Department of Overseas Trade, which is responsible for it. This department has the services of a widereaching intelligence system, comprising the British consular and commercial diplomatic services and the trade commission services throughout the world, and has in addition, a network of imperiol trade correspondents in the British dominions, colonies and protectorates. From this intelligence system a vast quantity of information is received, and the department is kept in the closest touch with commercial conditions in markets the world over.
