The yellow fever epidemic of 1878 will long be remembered as, in many respects, the most remarkable visitation of its kind. The rapidity with which it has apread from point to point, austiling localities heretofore considered exempt, pursuing its victims to doubtrious and high altitudes and striking down multituffes in the pure air of the hills and forests far from the polluted atmosphere of the infected cities, the death rate among the acclimated white natives, children and nagroos, and—above all—the tord ble mortality that has marked the fatal track of the securge in its northward course for eight hundred miles—are features which distinguish its from previous epidemics with startling significance. The pall of death and mourning darkens the great valley of the secure of sustences. The pall of death and mourning darkens the great valley of the value, and the local supposed from the contemplation of so wast a scene of suffering, desolation and scoreus, But, while bowing in sympathy with our fellow countrymen who are called to pass through so weefal an ordeal, may we not begin to look beyond and to draw some lessons for the futures. The spectacle is one that recalls to us that man was made a little lower than the angels, and in the light of such deeds done in leve for our common humanity we are enabled to see that this mysterious life has higher aims than selfish aggrandizement, and that human nature, with all its frailties, has in it that divine spark that enables it to rise superior to its own mortality. Not the loast conspicuous incident of this and visitation has been the hearty good will with which this help has been accepted. The whole South has been touched by this spontimeous manifestation of brotherhood by the means have used that human selfish agrandized are presented as a second to the recent rumor was started by coward their appearance on this side of the Rice grade or in the Nucceos valley this moon, ladied to find anything of the fiends who raided Korr county about the first of October, yet it would require a startling stretch of the physiognomical

Experiments are now making by the deficers of the Coast Wrecking Company looking to the use of the telephone in communicating with divers at work. This use was first made on a French man of war towing ship for the torpedo circuit. A wire was attached to the towing cable with due and on either vessed, and it was found that the action of the son on the vectoper established an electric current. Telephonic communication was carbidished, and conversation was carried on between the ships. This suggested the idea of using the instrument in the diving services. One of the glasses of the diver's helment is replaced by a copper plate, and in this is inserted a telephonic wire, and it becomes very easy to hold communication with the diver at whatever depther was the communication with the diver with the diver at whatever depther was abservations upon the keel of a vessel or the examination of wrecks, while it will make the work of submarine repairs and in special value in difficult examinations, much as observations upon the keel of a vessel or the examination of wrecks, while it will make the work of submarine repairs and in special value in difficult examinations, much as observations upon the keel of a vessel or the examination of wrecks, while it will make the work of submarine repairs and in special value in difficult examinations, much as observations upon the keel of a vessel or the examination of wrecks, while it will make the work of submarine repairs and in special value in difficult examinations, much as observations upon the keel of a vessel or the examination of wrecks, while it will make the work of submarine repairs and in special value in difficult examinations, much as observations upon the keel of a vessel or the examination of wrecks, while it will make the work of submarine repairs and in special value in difficult examinations, of wrecks, while it will make the work of submarine repairs and in special value in difficult examination, with the divers and the second of the divers have th

If you cannot get the herb, saturate strings with the oil and tie them around the necks of your pets, not too tight, and pour a little of the oil on their backs and around their ears. In about a fortnight the fleas will have disappeared. It is a common remedy against lice on horses to tie such strings once a day around the necks and tails of horses. Another remedy against fleas in the house (it is said) is to put camomile flowers in the beds and on the carpets. Snuff has also some reputation in this respect.—Manufacturer and Builder.
