The Struves' 5-Month Trip

(Editor's Note: Mr. and Mrs. Arno Struve were on a five-month trip late last year and early this year. Their travels took them to the Orient, South Pacific, Australia, New Zealand and other interesting places. The Review requested a series of stories on their trip. The series started earlier this year, but was held up to make room for the crush of current news. This week, we resume the very interesting story of the Struves' trip. Read the story and watch for a continuation of it in next week's paper.)

After a very interesting weekend in Sydney we needed to think ahead. On Monday morning an insistent toothache forced Minnie to see a dentist and also she had the constantly recurring problem of finding a hair dresser. While she was meeting these needs I went to get information about travel in the direction we wanted to go.

It became more apparent to us that if we wanted to go into the hot center and north of Australia it would be necessary to go as soon as possible. Any further delay in this direction would result in our being in those areas at a progressively less comfortable time of the year. The most direct routing toward our goal would be by train to Adelaide but since the Sydney-Adelaide-Perth train runs only twice a week and is usually booked up in advance this avenue of travel was not practical for us. Air travel would have been another alternative but costs being what they are and the urgency not quite that great we decided to go the much more traveled circular route going south first toward Melbourne and then westward to Adelaide.

Having decided the routing the next step was to actually purchase tickets. Here we ran up against another road block; A railway engineers strike prevented any bookings by the direct rail route to Melbourne. The booking agent flatly refused to talk about any alternative information. Not being given to giving up easily I went back to a purely information desk in hope that we might have other possibilities. This source of information was more productive. We would have to spend the night in Canberra to go this way but since we wanted to see Canberra anyhow this was OK.

After getting this information we naturally did not return to the same booking agent to purchase our ticket. Somehow you want to avoid people who are less than helpful. In any case we did get tickets and we were supposedly set from that angle, but more on that misapprehension later.

The next morning Minnie was not feeling well. Her back was giving her uncomfortable moments. At this point I thought perhaps my ideas and methods of travel were just too hard on her so I suggested to her that we limit our Australia travel to the southern portion of the country and thus be able to take it easier. But she would have none of that. A short taxi ride took us to Central Railway Station. Incidentally, taxi fares in Sydney and Australia generally are very reasonable. We rode in taxis more on this trip than we had ridden in them in all of the rest of our lives put together. I have always avoided taxis diligently, not quite trusting cabbies as a group. But we learned that they're not such a bad lot after all. As in all areas of life there are good people and difficult ones.

After we got on the train we discovered we had the wrong tickets. The ticket agent probably had not understood what our needs were. Of course it was irritating any my immediate reaction was to be somewhat impatient about the error, but it did no good to be angry. A patient conductor suggested that we work out the technicalities after we got to the Canberra station. Such an emotional upset is entirely unproductive and results in unnecessary fatigue.

The country between Sydney and Canberra was the usual vast areas of pasture lands. Grass grass, grass and sheep, sheep, sheep. The lay of the land is from rolling to mountainous.

The railroad follows the flattest route possible and therefore threads a circuitous path. Much of the time mountains are visible in the distance. The native bush has been cleaned off of most of this area and it seems to be very productive pasture country without a significant amount of cultivation. We arrived in Canberra shortly after noon tired and nervous from the mornings experiences. The tracks are not kept as smooth and level as they might be. As mentioned before the Australian railroads simply cannot be compared to the ultra-sophisticated Japanese lines. However, when one considers that the population densities of the two countries are poles apart and the consequent cost per unit mile of travel are vastly different one can understand why it is not economically feasible for the Australian trains to be the very best.

We immediately contacted the city tourist bureau in order to have accommodations for the night. We learned that most of the better places to stay were already full and that we needed to register at once for a place. We wanted to take a conducted afternoon tour of the city so we had to book it at once too. All of this was done efficiently through the city tourist bureau. We left our luggage in the bureau office and grabbed a quick sandwich nearby. At the sandwich shop we were waited on by a very nice lady and though the place was very busy her relaxed manner and ready smile eased our tensions considerably. She noticed the brooch of the U.S. flag that Minnie was wearing. It seemed to please her very much. Happily there are always some people around who can brighten up the day.

Immediately after lunch it was time to catch the tour bus. We seated ourselves behind a couple who were already on the bus. Since it was very hot I opened our window for some fresh air. The windows were the sliding kind that overlap when open. The man in front of me reacted violently when he saw the window moving past his head. He still had a full 12" of window that was a single thickness since our window had moved only about four inches. It turned out that he was afraid that his picture taking would be interfered with by the additional thickness of glass. My tension of the morning and the unfamiliarity of the surroundings left me with little reserve energy at this moment. I felt like falling through the floor. Of course I closed the window at once and the man's wife quickly tried to smooth over the situation. She wanted us to go ahead and open the window again but we thought it best to move to different seats on the opposite side of the bus. It turned out that these people were Americans from Gary, Indiana.

Canberra is a planned city as Washington D.C. is a planned city. In both cases the planners were not bold enough to envision the tremendous growths that would occur. Canberra was planned in the early part of this century and it was laid out to accommodate an eventual 25,000 people. The population today is 133,000 and by 1980 it is believed there will be 250,000 people there. The city has spread in area away from the original valley up side valleys. There is a high promontory within the city called Red Hill that gives a particularly good view of the main city and the adjacent areas that are building.

Canberra is a beautiful place. Homebuilders are given free plantings of trees and shrubs and as a consequence the "gardens" are gorgeous. The embassies are in one particular part of town and some like the U.S. Embassy are quite imposing.

In a prominent position in the main part of the city there has been erected a tall marble shaft which is a memorial to the participation of the U.S. in the defense of Australia in World War II. We had the definite feeling that the U.S. was much more appreciated and liked than was the mother country, Great Britain. It seems that they have much more in common with us at the present time at least than they have with England.

It had been advertised that we would be able to visit the parliament halls on the tour but when we got to the building we were only permitted to go into the outer rotunda. This was OK with us but many of the Australians on the tour were highly incensed. One particular young lady from Perth took the guide to task about it right then and there but got little satisfaction from him. Later on at the tour office she was seen demanding her money back. We didn't stay around long enough to see if she was successful. We sympathized with her because so many times tours are arbitrarily changed from the advertised itinerary. Tour promoters apparently are quite aware of the fact that they are not dependent on repeat business and therefore are very independent in their handling of tourists. Of course this isn't always the case but it is true too often.

A GAS outdoor grill gives food a tangy outdoor flavor without the time and bother of charcoal fire. Char-broiled flavor comes from the smoke of meat juices dripping on hot briquets. Charcoal itself provides no flavor.

Permanent ceramic briquets in the gas grill reach cooking heat in a few minutes, and there is no long wait to start cooking. The heat is regulated manually so there is no need to move a grill up or down.
